"I remember Chanukah in my home. It was already deep winter in Russia, bitterly cold, and high drifts of snow surrounded the dreary apartment building where we lived. We didn't dare light the menorah near a window. We barely dared lighting it at all. My father lit our small menorah in the wardrobe closet. We whispered Chanukah songs to ourselves. Once, we were silently standing around the flickering menorah, when the quiet was shattered by a banging on the door. We froze, terrified. My father blew out the menorah and threw it into a secret compartment he had built into the wardrobe, but the secret police were experts at finding hidden things, and even there they might find it. The knocks grew louder. My father opened the window to let out the smell of smoke. The door creaked open."

"And it was the KG...the police?" asked Tali, wide-eyed.

"No. It was just my friend Irina. We yanked her inside and told us she had given us such a scare. Oh, she was so sorry. We lit the menorah again, and Irina joined us in the whispered songs." Babushka said, sighing. "Thank God we live in a free country, where we can celebrate Chanukah without fear. I remember the first Chanukah after we left Russia, when my father was able to light the menorah in the window, for all to see. That menorah was one of the few things we were able to take with us when we left Russia.

"You took it with you?" Tali almost shrieked. "What happened to it? Where is it now?"

"On the windowsill, next to yours." replied, smiling Babushka.

Film producer tackles social and human rights issues

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Rookie documentary film producer Noemi Weis has demonstrated that she is a major-league contender. Her first two documentaries, hard-hitting films that grapple with controversial and disturbing social and human rights issues, were well received.

Indeed, her first film, Gloriously Free, which looks at the plight of homosexual refugees in Canada, recently won the Canadian Association of Broadcasters Golden Ribbon Award for documentaries and public affairs.

"I'm thrilled about the recognition," said Weis. "It's my first documentary, but I have lots of international production experience behind me. I also worked with a fantastic team."

Weis, a commercial advertising veteran with 25 years in the field, is a principal in Weis Advertising and the president of Filmblanc, an international production company specializing in commercials.

Her second documentary, Lets Talk About It, which focuses on the abuse of immigrant women, aired on Omni Television this year in September and October in Spanish and English respectively.

Weis had a real coup when feature filmmaker Deepa Mehta – her film Water is in major theatres now – signed on as director.

The film has garnered a lot of attention, said Weis. "We received an overwhelming response, not just in the media – we were in all the major papers – but from women's centres and educators."

Filmblanc, founded by Weis in 1998, branched out into documentary films with the release of Gloriously Free in November 2004. She says the move to documentaries was a natural development.

"I wanted to use the medium of film to give voice to important and relevant human rights issues. The documentary division is an extenuation of my internationalist philosophy to bring the world together.

"In each of my films, it's important to show that problems that stem from sexual orientation or violence have no international barriers. We try to show that these are universal problems that affect everybody."

The Argentine-born Weis – she came to Canada in 1975 – says her international orientation helps her identify the universality of social and human rights issues.

"I speak six languages. I relate to people in different parts of the world. I get involved."

The idea of Gloriously Free grew out of her work with an international creative development team that included people in the gay community who had sought refugee status in Canada.

Their stories prompted her to make the film about "what is a very compelling human rights story." The fact that Canada's laws changed and gay marriage is now legal was a development which occurred while production was underway and "purely coincidental," Weis noted.

"We were already working on the documentary when the laws came through."

Gloriously Free, which was directed by Ed Sinclair, follows five young men who find refuge in Canada after fleeing intolerance and persecution in their countries of birth.

"We have a good system here in Canada. Nothing is perfect, but we have a good system in comparison to many other countries in the world," said Weis.

And while the film focuses on gay rights, she stressed that the film is "about people being respected for who they are independent of their sexual orientation.

"The people we used are examples of many other people around the world who suffer and have to leave their native countries because of their sexual orientation."

Translated into seven languages, Gloriously Free has been broadcasted on CBC Newsworld, Here TV in the United States, and an Israeli cable channel. So far it has been accepted and/or screened at five international film festivals.

Weis said her second film, Lets Talk About It, is a story "that needed to be told because the cycle of domestic abuse has not been broken."

In the film, young people who live in homes where domestic violence has occurred, interview their parents about the abuse. Mehta taught the children how to use video cameras.

The children interview their parents in the privacy of their homes, without the presence of a film crew. "We could never have achieved the same level of intimacy as the children did on their own," Weis said, adding that the experience of speaking from behind the camera empowered the children, enabling them to ask very direct questions about the domestic violence they had witnessed.

"They talked about issues that had never been raised [in the family] before," said Weis.

Mehta was Weis' first choice for the film's director. "She normally does not do documentaries. I knew this project would be right for her politically… As a Canadian who came from abroad, I knew she would be able to relate to the plight of these female immigrants," said Weis.

"We worked as a team in an intense way. We saw eye to eye on the basics and we had the same values and philosophy that we wanted to portray."

Concert caps Beth Emeth's Golden Jubilee celebrations

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

World-renowned Israeli singer Shuly Nathan and versatile Toronto musician and singer Mickey Lewin will perform at a concert that is the culmination of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's Golden Jubilee celebrations.

Titled "Jerusalem of Gold," the concert takes place on Wednesday, Dec. 7, at 7:30 p.m. at the synagogue.

Lewin said he is honoured to perform again on the same stage with Nathan, one of Israel's legendary singers. "Following the huge success of our joint concert in Toronto last May, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue commissioned us to give a concert at the culmination of its Golden Jubilee," he said.

Nathan electrified Israelis in 1967 when as a 19-year-old unknown singer she was chosen by world-famous composer Naomi Shemer to sing her composition Yerushalayim Shel Zahav (Jerusalem of Gold). Shemer had heard the teenager on an amateur radio program.

Shemer, who died last year, wrote Yerushalayim Shel Zahav after Teddy Kollek, former mayor of Jerusalem, asked her to write a song for the Independence Day Song Festival.

Two weeks after Nathan's performance, the Six Day War broke out and the song became the anthem of the war. It has remained Israel's unofficial second national anthem and went on to become one of the bestselling records of its time.

Over the years, Nathan and her guitar have appeared throughout the world to enthusiastic audiences who want to hear her version of Yerushalayim Shel Zahav and she has received many rave reviews for her rendition of the song.

Nathan performs in five languages amd has many folk songs in her repertoire, including traditional Hebrew, Yiddish, chassidic and Ladino songs. The mother of five children, Nathan lives in Ranana.

Lewin, who was born in Israel, has become a well-known performer in Canada and the United States. His captivating warmth and style have made him a sought-after performer who appeals to young and old alike.

His repertoire includes show tunes, folk favourites, chassidic classics, Yiddish melodies, Israeli folk songs and modern favourites.

For tickets ($18) to the Shuly Nathan/Mickey Lewin concert, call 416- 633-3838 or visit Aleph Bet Judaica, 3453 Bathurst, 416- 781-2133.

Restaurant workers philosophize in The Dishwashers

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

In the bowels of every restaurant, dishwashers toil for hours to keep the upstairs world satisfied. The scrubbing turns monotonous and the basement fosters claustrophobia, but beyond the clanking plates and stained forks lies a concerted motivation: the dirtiest work can spark the brightest ideas.

That's one of the many elements that make up The Dishwashers, a dark comedy by Morris Panych playing at the Tarragon Theatre until Dec. 18. Three restaurant workers wash dishes and philosophize on life's grander notions, while a secret hangs over their conversations.

Emmet (Jonathan Crombie) is the newcomer to the dishwashing crew, joining the hardened vet Dressler (Randy Hughson) and the sickly Moss (Eric Peterson). Tension thickens the basement air when Moss eyes Emmet suspiciously, thinking the youngster will steal his job. Dressler soon befriends Emmet by sharing insights into everything from crème brulee's larger purpose to the realities of aging.

"When you get older," Dressler tells the newcomer, "your dreams become smaller. You have little wishes, like hoping the cheese won't be off."

Talk often turns to the task of hand-cleaning the dishes for the diners upstairs. Emmet begins to resent his working conditions, while Dressler takes the more practical view of "work hard because that's all there is." His determination nicely mirrors that fatalistic employee who throws up his hands and says, "Work to make money. Don't dream too big."

But Emmet can't help but dream, since his girlfriend pressures him to find a more respectable job. In come more theories surrounding the purpose of jobs, and what jobs offer blue-collared employees. Hughson forcefully spits Dressler's philosophies on the matter like a man possessed with conviction, and Crombie nicely matches Hughson's intensity with a bubbling anger born from frustration.

The scene stealer belongs to Peterson, a theatre vet who wonderfully plays a wheezing on-death's-door old man who fools himself into thinking he makes a good dishwasher. Panych gives Peterson such poignant lines that the audience can't help but pity the grizzled Moss who drags his dialysis machine to the sink. But the words can only convey so much; Peterson's facial expressions and exaggerated movements flesh out a character only a select few could play with such fluidity. It could be a wild glance or 20-second coughing fit that gives the audience an in-depth look into a sad old man who looks forward to sleep and enemas.

Daniel Karasik, a young actor and playwright who makes his Tarragon debut in The Dishwashers, only delivers a few lines in the final scene, but playing opposite a theatre veteran like Peterson can only propel the Thornhill teen to a bright future.

At the play's conclusion, the comedy's aftertaste is refreshing with its deeper themes centring on work, relationships, friendship and death. Appreciate what you have, Panych seems to say, because what you wish for may not be what you really desire.

And don't forget who keeps those dishes clean. Someone has to do the world's dirty work.

For tickets to The Dishwashers, at the Tarragon Theatre from Tuesday to Saturday, 8 p.m., and Saturday and Sunday at 2:30 p.m until Dec. 18, call 416-531-1827.

Ushpizin is subdued, subtle and compelling

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Gidi Dar's Ushpizin is a rarity, one of the precious few films in Israeli cinema about Israel's deeply insular, often misunderstood and sometimes reviled haredi community.

Yet Ushpizin, which opens in local theatres on Dec. 2, is much more than an examination of the closed, rarely glimpsed world of the haredim. This subdued 90-minute film celebrates the astonishing power of faith and a person's ability to weather a personal crisis in the face of confusion and turbulence.

It unfolds before, during and after Sukkot, and is set in a haredi quarter of Jerusalem.

Moshe Bellanga (played by scriptwriter Shuli Rand), a Breslau chassid, is "dead broke," as he laments. He is so poor that he can't afford a sukkah or a lulav and etrog. Nor is there much food on the table. The fridge is virtually empty, and the rent is due.

His childless wife, Mali (Michal Bat Sheva Rand), is running out of patience.

"Merciful father, I can't take it anymore," she cries, bewailing her fate.

Wandering through the streets of Jerusalem, Moshe meets a friend, Ben Baruch (Avraham Abutbul), who says, "You're being tested."

And so he is.

In the meantime, Moshe is overcome by a wave of sadness and self-pity. Separately, he and Mali fervently pray for a ness, a miracle that will neatly resolve their pressing financial problems.

Shuli Rand plays Moshe Bellanga in Ushpizin

When a stranger in the city dies, Moshe and Mali become the recipients of a windfall, an anonymous $1,000 gift from a charitable organization. Then, thanks to Ben Baruch, he obtains the loan of a sukkah.

In delirious haste, Moshe buys an exquisite 1,000-shekel etrog, believed to be the finest in Jerusalem. Mali protests his extravagance, but he insists that the diamond-shaped fruit will bring them luck and a child.

At this point, Dar shifts course and introduces two escaped convicts, Eliyahu Scorpio (Shaul Mizrahi) and Yossef (Ilan Ganani), into the picture. They are crude, coarse and vulgar, unlike Moshe.

Having once known Moshe, they turn up at his house. Since it is considered a mitzvah to host guests in a sukkah, Moshe welcomes Eliyahu and Yossef, but he implores them not to mention his criminal past.

Being indiscreet and untrustworthy, his holiday guests spill his secret. In desperation, Moshe consults his rebbe for advice.

"My guests are not so holy," he complains in an understatement. The rebbe urges him to remain calm.

Eliyahu and Yossef, being ingrates, abuse Moshe's hospitality, making fun of him and his piety. Worse still, they scandalize the neighbours by drinking, smoking and playing loud music. In short, they make spectacles of themselves.

Fed up with their unruly behaviour, and angry with her husband because he was less than candid about his past, Mali leaves Moshe. Mali's abrupt departure is a severe blow, since Moshe cannot manage without her. The calamity is compounded when his boorish friends appropriate the valued etrog as a dressing for a Middle East salad they devour.

Dar handles these situations with a steady hand, and the film flows smoothly, like a gurgling mountain brook.

Ushpizin treats its haredi characters with restraint and empathy, and they come off not as aliens but as normal people facing everyday realities. Why, though, are the only secular Jews in the film jailbirds?

Rand, a haredi ba'al tshuvah in real life, is terrific. He brings precision, passion and pathos to his pivotal role. A viewer is never left with the impression that he is acting from a script.

Although shoots of self-consciousness poke through her performance, Bat Sheva Rand, Shuli's wife and a first-time actress, is quite convincing as a haredi woman coping with her husband's embarrassing impoverishment and his loutish friends.

Skillfully crafted and for the most part beautifully acted, Ushpizin is a modest production. But on a deeper level, it is subtle and compelling, and succeeds in drawing the viewer into its universe.

See interview with director Dar on the next page.

Israeli director made sweeping concessions to film Ushpizin

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In Gidi Dar's new film Ushpizin, a haredi Jew in Jerusalem, having come into a modest sum of money, generously invites two rough-hewn Jewish convicts into his home on Sukkot.

It is considered a blessing to host ushpizin – "holy guests" in Aramaic – in one's sukkah.

Not surprisingly, Dar also felt like a guest when he filmed Ushpizin, an Israeli movie that offers a peek into the cloistered universe of haredi Jews.

"It was intriguing to walk into this unknown land," said Dar, a 41-year-old secular director from Tel Aviv whose movie is scheduled to open in Toronto on Dec. 2.

"I enjoyed opening the door to their world, though it was a hard and complicated experience," he added in a telephone interview from New York City.

To make Ushpizin, an artistic and commercial hit in Israel, Dar had to submit to a number of restrictions imposed by Shuli Rand, the film's lead actor and screenwriter.

Born into a fervently pious home in the haredi enclave of Bnei Brak, Rand left the religious life to attend an acting school in Tel Aviv. He was a successful theatre actor and appeared in several films, including Life According to Agfa and Eddie King, in which he made his debut as a movie actor.

In 1996, Rand returned to his roots and became devout once more. For the next few years, he dedicated himself to the study of Torah. But in 2000, he performed in a one-man show adapted from S.Y. Agnon's A Tale of Two Scholars from Our Town.

Through all these twists and turns, Dar maintained his friendship with Rand, whom he had always thought was the best actor he had ever worked with.

Two years ago, Dar, eager to collaborate with him again, sounded out Rand about the possibility of making a movie together.

"Shuli laughed," he said.

Rand was flattered, but informed Dar that his religious obligations foreclosed the idea of seriously considering his proposal. He could not, for example, work on the Sabbath.

"So I suggested that we do a film on his terms, one that would honour his limitations."

Rand consulted his rabbi, who advised him that Dar's film about haredim could be used to form bonds between two solitudes, religious and non-observant Jews in Israel.

Having won the approval of his rebbe, Rand promised to do the film. But before production could begin, Dar had to sign an agreement in which he pledged to keep a kosher set and not to work on the film, in any capacity whatsoever, on Shabbat.

Then another problem cropped up. Rand told Dar that he could not act opposite a woman other than his own wife, Michal Bat Sheva.

"It was clear that, without her, there would be no moyie," Dar said.

Not being an actress, Bat Sheva was reluctant to be in the film. "Shuli and I were more confident about her than she was of herself."

Once she changed her mind, she proved to be a quick study, bringing sensitivity and a dash of humour to her role as the long-suffering wife of an impoverished haredi.

Like Bat Sheva, all the actors playing religious Jews were themselves either non-actors or former performers who had embraced the haredi lifestyle.

"It would have been easier to hire secular actors and dress them up like haredim, like they always do in movies, but it would never be the same," observed Dar.

Ushpizin was shot in 25 days in haredi neighbourhoods in Jerusalem, but Dar also used a specially constructed set near Meah Shearim, an ultra-Orthodox enclave in Israel's capital.

Dar describes the film as the first made by members of the haredi community, in collaboration with secular filmmakers, aimed at a general audience.

He deliberately accentuated the positive, choosing not to criticize their very traditional way of life.

Asked to compare Ushpizin with Kadosh, Amos Gitai's film featuring a similar haredi backdrop, Dar said, "Mine is very different. I made it from the inside. Kadosh was made completely from the outside."

Dar added that Gitai's treatment of the haredim was inaccurate.

As part of his deal with Rand, Dar also agreed that Ushpizin would be screened in theatres in Israel only on weekdays, never on the Sabbath.

"We were afraid it would affect us financially, but it didn't." This restriction, though, does not apply abroad.

Ushpizin, which had its premiere in the summer of 2004 and cost just under $1 million (US) to make, earned $2 million in box office receipts in Israel.

Haredim, not permitting themselves to watch the film in theatres, saw it in its pirated form in their homes. As a result, Dar was worried that he would lose a lot of revenue. But after he bought a newspaper ad urging them to cover the costs of tickets they never purchased, many haredim sent him money.

In the United States, the film distributor rented special venues to accommodate haredi audiences. Otherwise, Ushpizin has been shown in regular theatres.

The film has earned critical praise. Rand won the Israeli Film Critics Association Award and the Israeli Film Academy prize as best actor.

Encouraged by the response, he and his wife established the Jewish Theatre of Jerusalem.

Asked whether he intends to team up with Rand again in the future, Dar replied, "I don't know. I'm not sure I want to go through that experience again. But other film directors may try."

Paisley celebrates 50 years of selling insurance

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When people think of the insurance business, they rarely think of it as glamourous, say brothers-in-law Ira Kuchinsky and Michael Paisley of Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers Inc.

"There are no television shows about the insurance business, and no one grows up thinking they want to be an insurance agent," says Paisley, the firm's president.

"Insurance is really one of the best-kept secrets, though. It can be exciting and interesting work. We meet a variety of people who are involved in every business imaginable.

"It may seem boring on the outside, but at the end of the day, we get satisfaction knowing that we have helped someone through a calamity," he says.

Founder Irving Paisley

Paisley Manor, now celebrating its 50th anniversary, is a full-service firm that handles business insurance, home and auto insurance, life and financial services, mutual funds, group benefits programs, hard-to-place risks, specialized lines, and fleets.

The firm now has 12 independent brokers and 50 employees in its Don Mills office and its branch office in Richmond Hill.

The pair took over the business from its founder Irving Paisley, now 86 – Paisley's father and Kuchinsky's father-in-law – after he retired more than 20 years ago.

"He's retired, but he is still very much an icon here. His philosophy of running a business with integrity, responsibility and commitment still drives us today. My father saw business the way he saw life," says Paisley.

Irving Paisley's legacy, says Kuchinsky, Paisley Manor's CEO, includes his business, which started out in 1955 in his basement at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue.

"He had a home office before people knew what a home office was," Kuchinsky says.

Part of his legacy is also his community involvement, which includes being a co-founder of York Finch Hospital and Temple Sinai, and nearly 30 years in local municipal politics.

"It took 10 years to establish the hospital and there was no government support at the time. He went on to serve for 25 years as an executive member and was appointed a lifetime member of the board of directors," Kuchinsky says.

As chair of its building committee, he also spearheaded efforts to establish Temple Sinai and was appointed a lifetime member of the board of directors, says Paisley.

"When [Temple Sinai founding rabbi] Rabbi Jordan Pearlson first came to Toronto, he stayed in my parents' home. He tells me that my first steps were toward him," says Paisley, who still belongs to the temple.

While in elected politics, Irving Paisley was involved in a number of issues, from supporting the fluoridation of Toronto's water supply to community growth and transportation, says Kuchinsky, who is also a member of Temple Sinai.

Michael Paisley, a husband and father of three children ages 20, 17 and 13, still remembers as a young boy accompanying his father on his rounds to collect premiums. "I am now seeing the grandchildren of these people. They are getting married and calling me."

Kuchinsky, who with his wife has two children ages 28 and 25, says he has been to the bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings, brit milahs and funerals of his clients. "It really shows the life cycle."

Originally from Halifax, Kuchinsky has been with the business for 32 years. "When I graduated with an MBA from the University of Western Ontario, I had another job offer, but Irving asked me to come into the business. I tried it, and I liked it."

As a member of the board of the Jewish National Fund, Kuchinsky had returned from a JNF mission to Israel just prior to speaking to The CJN.

"Our success as a second-generation business is unusual. The key is that we've built the business significantly since we took over, but we have never forgotten our roots. More important than the size of the business are its values.

"Our biggest responsibility is maintaining our reputation. Our desire to grow larger [is held in check] by our desire to do a good job. Our relationships with people are paramount to our long-term success. We've outlived many of our [insurance] carriers," says Kuchinsky.

The brokerage business is not typically a transient one, he says, but "we are unusual with regards to the longevity of our relationships with our clients, staff and carriers."

With at least four husband-and-wife teams and five sets of siblings on staff, "we truly believe that the core values of family and community radiate out from the centre," says Paisley.

Indeed, the company has put a significant effort into developing programs for Judaic institutions such as schools, camps, synagogues and non-profit organizations, Paisley says.

"The Jewish community has special needs. We have developed programs to address these needs, and we have the ability to deal with the Judaic element of the organization.

"Imagine trying to explain tfillin or Torah adornments to a [non-Jewish] underwriter. It takes a certain kind of understanding."

The storm that hit the Toronto area in late August wreaked havoc with a number of these institutions just before the High Holy Days, says Paisley.

"We were instrumental in responding quickly and efficiently. At the end of the day, we were there to explain the nuances and subtleties of the Jewish world to non-Jewish carriers.

"On the day of that [late summer] flood, our phone was ringing off the hook. The company has been in business since Hurricane Hazel. Whether [our clients] are in car accidents, have fires or have corporate issues, we're there to help them.

"We deal primarily with businesses, but businesses are made up of people. We represent some large, privately owned companies, but our clients primarily run businesses that are entrepreneurially based, and they want to relate to a professional."

With a large portion of its brokers being Jewish, says Kuchinsky, the firm is "a reflection of the Jewish community. We have representatives here from all spectrums of Judaism. We're not strictly Jewish, but in a largely non-Jewish industry, we believe we are unique."

In honour of the firm's 50th anniversary, the pair have decided to earmark money toward a number of charities rather than celebrate with a big party.

"Our client base is involved in a variety of community organizations, so we have decided to donate to those charities that need money [the most]. It's more important that we have a good name rather than a good time. My father and my mother [Adele] taught me to support the community," says Paisley.

"Although we plan to continue supporting charities, during our 50th anniversary year, more than 50 charities have received our donations," says Kuchinsky.

Author aims to convey 'what using Yiddish feels like'

Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of Its Moods*, by Michael Wex, St. Martin's Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Yiddish today is obscured by mystery, by trauma and by sentiment. By mystery, because it is little known; by trauma, through the destruction of its speakers and the postwar decision to abandon it in favour of Hebrew; and by sentiment, since some of its devotees view the language as a venue for expressing a light-hearted, old-fashioned, largely nostalgic view of their Jewish past.

Norman Ravvin

Michael Wex's Born to Kvetch is an excellent challenge to the status quo. Wex is funny and irreverent, a born shpritzer, and most importantly, he is extremely well informed and intimate with his subject. Yiddish, in his hands, is like the beloved object of an obsessive collector, a thing turned over and caressed in so many ways that it becomes almost an appendage – a fifth limb, or a sixth sense.

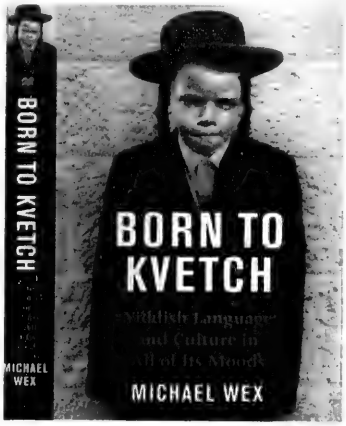
Born to Kvetch offers some background history to account for the development of the language and its pre-eastern European roots: "As a definitive cultural phenomenon – as the main language of a whole society – Yiddish can be said to have flourished form the First Crusade to the end of World War II, give or take a few years on either end." But Wex's main aim is to convey what using Yiddish feels like – the quality of its idiomatic flourishes, and the cultural resources from which it draws its strengths. In particular, he dedicates a number of chapters to conveying how the talmudic habit of mind, along with the stories and images of midrashic literature, influenced Yiddish language and imaginative life.

Wex contrasts Yiddish-speaking habits in Poland, Lithuania and Galicia. He has an expert ear for the way the language was spoken in these geographical areas, and for some of the inadvertent comedy that arose as the different manners of speaking collided in European academies and in North America. One of the outcomes of this collision was klal-shprakh: "the standard language first developed in the 1920s and '30s by scholars associated with YIVO (Yidisher Visnshaftlikher Institute, the Jewish Scientific Institute founded in Vilna and now based in New York). Their ideal [was] a sort of unlocalized "broadcast Yiddish" for use in mass media, public addresses, educational institutions and so on."

The outcome of such efforts, according to Wex, is that those under the age of 40, who have learned YIVO-inflected Yiddish in a university classroom, "speak no dialect ever used in synagogues or marketplaces, in bedrooms or bathrooms, in heaven or on earth."

Wex is quick to dispel a range of myths that have grown up around Yiddish. One of these is the often repeated notion that Yiddish lacks any terminology for the description of nature. To this claim, Wex counters that the "classic triumvirate of Mendele Moykher Sforim, Sholem Aleykhem, and Y.L. Peretz, all of whom lived into the second decade of the 20th century, certainly had no trouble talking about (and identifying) trees, domestic animals and occasional wildflowers." Jews in pre-World War II Europe, he adds, "could recognize and name the flora and fauna of their immediate vicinity no less accurately than the gentiles."

Wex goes to great lengths in Born to Kvetch to view Yiddish through the eyes of a cultural historian and social ethnographer. But his favourite voice – and that which makes his book stand out among its competitors – is that of cultural provocateur. He has honed his talents as a kind of stand-up scholar-in-residence on the growing international circuit that includes Klezkamp and Klezkanada, the Yiddish folk-arts programs. It is here that his sources shift from the likes of Yiddish linguist Max Weinreich to klezmer musician Mickey Katz. Whether he is discussing Yiddish usage in relation to food, sex, or death, there is a willingness to choose the most ribald example, to update his detailed idiomatic explanations by evoking language at its most pungent.



Born to Kvetch includes, for example, a careful disquisition on the difference between a shlumperke and a shtinkerke, terms to describe slovenly homemakers, though the latter is "as close as Yiddish comes to an idea of Jewish trailer trash." A katsenyomer, he reminds us, is a hangover in both Yiddish and German, "Kez," cheese, was also thieves' slang for money. The book includes an eight-page section devoted to Yiddish words for male and female genitals, with a fulsome addendum detailing Yiddish terminology associated with sex.

But alongside all this bodily language – the lingo for illness and, of course, kvetching – Wex is adept at conveying the particular quality of the Yiddish sublime. There is a nice riff on the ruf-nomen, or "call-name," which, traditionally, contains a man's "metaphysical essence and by which he is called to the Torah in the synagogue." And to develop its argument, Born to Kvetch relies not just on references to Katz, jazz singer Louis Prima and Fleetwood Mac but also to Chaucer, Shakespeare and Milton. The outcome of this approach is to place Yiddish, naturally and firmly, in the realm of world culture and literature.

One quibble with the book might be that it overplays Jewish anxiety and antagonism toward non-Jews. Wex conveys, with thoroughness and verve, the uniqueness of Yiddish culture, and doesn't necessarily further his point by arguing that "Jews are not merely out of step with Christian civilization, they hold it in utter contempt." It's also surprising, considering Wex's savvy distaste for mythic representations of Yiddish, to see him play up its rootedness in an exile mentality. He is so competent at accounting for the at-homeness of Yiddish in eastern Europe, that his account of the language's relationship to the "danger and instability" of an eternal Jewish homelessness seems like an afterthought.

Born to Kvetch is erudite and timely, but its greatest accomplishment is an avoidance of sentimentality as it presents a language alive with wit, irony and metaphysical yearning. Reading Wex's book makes one believe that all one has to do is go to the front door and open it, to find a world outside where Yiddish lives.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Clarification

In the Party Planner article "Flowers may be the most important part of any event" (CJN, Nov. 24), it wasn't made clear that Fran Sackler has been in the florist business for 40 years, but for only two of those years has she worked out of her home. The CJN regrets the error.

Bienstock's latest documentary about global sex slave trade

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Filming her latest documentary, Sex Slaves, Ric Esther Bienstock put in a number of nine to five days – nine a.m. until five a.m.

The film, produced by Associated Producers Ltd. in association with True Vision, CBC, Channel 4 and Canal D, investigates the trafficking of women from the former Soviet bloc into the global sex slave trade.

Written, directed and co-produced by Bienstock, Associated Producer's vice-president of production, Sex Slaves takes viewers inside the world of trafficking to meet victims, their families and the traffickers.

A native of Montreal and a graduate of McGill University, Bienstock, 45, is a wife and a mother of two children ages nine and seven.

She has been involved in such productions as Impact of Terror, a documentary about the ripple effects of a suicide bombing in Israel; Ebola: Inside an Outbreak, about the outbreak in Zaire; Deadly Currents, which explored both sides of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict; Boxing: In and Out of the Ring; Ms Conceptions, about single mothers by choice; and Penn & Teller's Magic and Mystery Tour, a three-part documentary on the roots of magic.

It was several years ago, while preparing to film the Penn & Teller's Magic and Mystery Tour in rural China, that Bienstock discovered a modern hotel that was serving as a brothel, she said.

"There was a sea of Chinese prostitutes, and two blond women in their early 20s who told us – her associate Felix Golubev spoke Russian – that they were duped by Russian- speaking Chinese pimps who lured them to China with promises of employment as waitresses. Once they crossed the border, they were beaten, raped, and told they had to work as prostitutes.

"Their stories haunted me, and as I began to look into it, I discovered a huge new wave of 21st century white slavery. The seeds for [the documentary] were planted."

She spoke to Simcha Jacobovici, president of Associated Producers, she said, and he agreed that they should go ahead with a film.

Rather than make a "victim film" that told someone's life in retrospect, she said, they wanted to get inside the world of trafficking and follow at least one unfolding story.

"I realized that the only way to really see the world was to go undercover.

"When you make a documentary you have to throw yourself into the environment. No amount of reading or phone calls can prepare you."

With tips that included one from the Ukrainian secret service, they were able to follow a group of girls who were travelling to Turkey, interview two girls already in Turkey, speak to a trafficker, and talk to a man whose pregnant wife had been trafficked to Turkey, among a number of other interviews.

"Our aim was to put a human face on this story. We worked with cops and pimps, secret agents and social workers to get inside a criminal world that is filled with lies, treachery and violence. It is a world often seen in Hollywood films, but never [until now] exposed in documentaries."

What all the Ukrainian women had in common, she said, was that they longed for a better life. "They had no hope for life [in Ukraine].

"A lot of them had heard about traffickers but did not believe it could happen to them. They wanted to believe [they could have a better life].

"It is a harsh, brutal society. People turn on each other for a dime; it's shocking. The challenge when filming is to make people know that its real. They're not watching a movie."

The film, which aired recently on CBC, has received tremendous response, Bienstock said, and they've opened a trust account to help save women featured in it. "You can't just walk away from a subject like this."

New committee to engage Jews in electoral process

CJPAC is headed b a 12-person board, chaired by businessman Lawrence Zimmering. It has members in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec.

"I am very excited to be part of this organization as it will redefine how our community engages in Canadian politics," said Zimmering. "We have developed an outstanding national board with membership from all political backgrounds. This is a tremendous step forward for Canadian Jewish advocacy."

Cooper said CJPAC's first order of business is to "get people involved… The reality is that our community has really fallen asleep at the switch and we're not engaged politically."

CJPAC encourages people to join riding associations of whichever party they prefer, work for candidates and generally participate in the political process.

Between elections, CJPAC plans educational events, workshops to train grassroots advocates, education in letter writing and other elements in the political process, he said.

"A premium has been placed on education, volunteer participation in the political process and encouraging a larger cross section of individuals to make financial contributions to candidates," CJPAC's news release states.

CJPAC can be reached through its website, www.cjpac.ca.

Canadian-born hoopster a rising star on the court

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Over the phone from Florida, Marisa Gobuty sounds just like your average teen as she giggles a bit between answering a reporter's questions.

But at only 16, the Canadian-born Gobuty – who is also an Israeli citizen – is making a bigger and bigger name for herself as one of the Jewish state's fastest rising young basketball stars.

Gobuty was in Florida because she spends half the year there attending the basketball program at the famous IMG Academies. It's a place best known for honing the skills of top professional tennis players, but its basketball program is also highly regarded and has trained many future NBA stars.

Gobuty lives in Bradenton, Fla., and competes for the the Pendleton School team. The rest of the year she lives in Herzliyah, Israel, and plays for the B'nai Herzliyah club.

Gobuty stands only 5-6, which is short by basketball standards, especially compared to American players. The average female player's height in Israel is around 5-7, while American players are taller than her by several inches. But what Gobuty lacks in physical stature she more than makes up for with agility, finesse, and a thinking girl's approach to the game.

She is known as a smart player, who anticipates her opponents' moves on the court brilliantly. The IMG Academies website described Gobuty as a "very strong ball handler" who "uses both hands extremely well."

"My style is different than most girls my age," Gobuty said. "My strengths are assisting, passing, ball-handling.

"In the U.S., the game is all about athleticism, how quick you are and how high you can jump. In Israel, it's skill and technique."

In fact, Gobuty plays well everywhere, including on the 16-and-under Israeli national team.

The competition to make that team, she said, "is tough, " since she plays point guard, like many others vying for a spot on the squad. Three hundred girls come to the tryouts, and they are whittled down to a final 12.

Gobuty has been something of a basketball phenomenon. Born in Toronto, she and her family moved to Encino, Calif., when she was seven years old, and then to Israel when she was nine.

Gobuty has three passports – Canadian, American and Israeli – but said she most often uses the Canadian one because, "when you tell people you're Canadian, they treat you nicer."

Her love affair with basketball began after moving to California and watching her older sister – who has long since given up the game – playing.

By the fourth grade, "I was addicted to the game," Gobuty said.

"It was the excitement of it all, the quickness and the skill it required. It became my life."

At age nine, Gobuty scored the winning point while playing for the championship on the Encino Balboa Stars team.

To say Gobuty's life revolves around basketball is to put it mildly. She practices four hours a day in Florida, and said she's been lucky to have suffered only slight and very occasional injuries.

So what does she feel is the most challenging part of basketball?

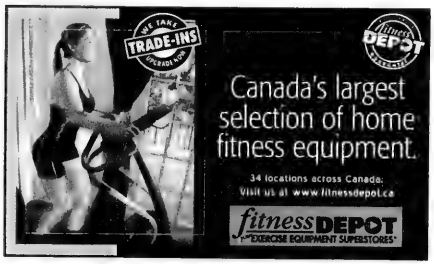
"My size," she replied instantly. "It gets more difficult to score when you're surrounded by tall players, and I have to find ways to overcome that."

While she's not sure if she will become a full-time professional player, Gobuty said she may compete professionally for a few years in Europe, where she said the style of play is more like it is in Israel than in the United States.

Gobuty, who now speaks Hebrew well, laughed about having developed an American accent from spending several years in California.

But it's life in Israel that has truly seduced her.

"It just feels like home," she said. "I love the Israeli culture."



Argos season ends too soon for Cantor

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Usually when The CJN talks to Noah Cantor at this time of year, the Argos' nose tackle is basking in the euphoria of yet another Grey Cup win. With four Cups under his belt and with the Argos finishing first in the CFL's Eastern Conference, it seemed a good bet the front runners would again be Grey Cup finalists, if not winners.

But the Argos' 11-7 season came to an unexpected end in the Eastern final against the 10-8 Montreal Alouettes, thanks to a second half collapse that shocked many observers. No one expected the talented and veteran Argos to screw up so badly.

The 33-17 loss to the Als put the Toronto Argonauts on the sidelines, and like millions of other couch-sitting, channel flipping CFL fans, Cantor will have to sit back in the recliner to watch the annual fall classic.

Or maybe not. When The CJN spoke to the six-foot-three, 270-lb. lineman last week, he was still "bitter" over the way the Argo season ended. "Anytime you lose the last game of the season, it's disappointing," he said. "What hurts the most is we feel we should have been playing in the Grey Cup."

The first place Argos seemed to be a lock to repeat as Grey Cup finalists, but five turnovers in the second half, penalties at crucial moments and the inability to stop the Alouettes' ground attack, put paid to the Boatmen's season.

Everything that went wrong for the Argos this season seemed to go wrong at the same time. "The most shocking thing was that the bad things that happened to us...all happened in the second half," Cantor said.

Noah Cantor

Prior to the season, "the guys on the team felt we brought everybody back and it was ours to lose," he said. Spirits were high and the team never suffered from a lack of confidence. Although he didn't have quite the season he had in 2004, when he was third in the league in sacks (10 in 2004, two in 2005), Cantor said 2005 "statistically wasn't my best season, but I felt I was playing my best games."

It was a sentiment shared by Argos' coaches and management, who exercised their option on Cantor's contract. The big lineman will be back for his 13th season of pro ball next spring.

Cantor, who's 34 now, left Toronto shortly after the season ended to spend time with his family in Ottawa, his hometown. From there he flew to Vancouver, where he makes his permanent home. Cantor played five seasons with the Lions and he and a partner operate a restaurant chain, Vera's Burger Shack, in the west coast city. The restaurants are doing so well, this past year they added a fourth corporate-owned outlet and franchised a fifth.

As for his football future, Cantor said he'll think about that following next season.

Caring for a parent: a delicate balance

By DR. MICHAEL GORDON

Evelyn and Gloria are two devoted daughters of an 88-year-old woman still living in her two-bedroom apartment.

A widow for 15 years, Ruth managed her affairs quite well until three years ago, when the sisters and their brother in Edmonton noticed some loss of her usual fastidiousness in her grooming and in her apartment. They assisted Ruth by arranging for a weekly visit by a cleaning lady, whom Ruth begrudgingly accepted. Gradually, Ruth's mental abilities declined, and her increasing forgetfulness became more and more obvious. She could no longer do her banking or pay her bills.

The Senior Side of Life

Evelyn and Gloria both worked and had families of their own. They split up the tasks related to their mother and managed to get everything done. As well, they arranged for a geriatric assessment that confirmed their worst fears: Ruth had evidence of dementia, probably of the Alzheimer type. She also had other previously diagnosed medical problems, including high blood pressure (hypertension) and type 2 diabetes, which required numerous daily medications.

After the diagnosis of dementia, Ruth started taking a medication commonly used for such conditions. The daughters understood that such drugs, although not curative, might have some benefit and might decrease the progression of the disease. There were a few months of cognitive and behavioural improvement, but these proved transient. Ruth agreed to join an Alzheimer's day program and enjoyed attending it three times a week. But on the other days, she was home alone, other than when visiting family. Her daughters became increasingly concerned about her well-being and safety.

Ruth refused to have anyone in the house with her during her weekdays and weekends at home. Evelyn and Gloria became increasingly concerned, because despite their devoted supervision and visits, they could not fill all the days and nights. They worried that Ruth might fall, or leave the stove on or the sink running. Ruth phoned her daughters regularly, often about the same concern two or three times in one hour.

Ruth, Evelyn and Gloria came to my office for advice. From the point of view of medical treatments, things were about as good as they could be. But the daughters observed that Ruth often forgot to take her medications. The dosette pill dispenser they carefully filled was not always emptied of the correct pills. Although they worked at first, phone calls during the day to remind her to take her pills were no longer effective.

Evelyn felt that maybe a retirement home with some assisted-living component was necessary, but Gloria was reluctant, and Ruth would have none of it. Gloria asked me to recommend to Ruth that she have someone in the apartment for a few hours every day, including weekends. Ruth adamantly declined, saying, "I'm fine"– a common response in people with dementia. Neither daughter wanted to "force" their mother into a decision, but they felt compelled to do something.

During our discussion, Ruth listened carefully to their concerns, while denying she had any problems. Eventually, with some cajoling and on my "medical order," she agreed to "try it out," having someone come every day and weekends, for three months, and she "promised" to continue with that plan until the next visit, when we would review the situation.

Three months later, Ruth came to the office and agreed that the arrangement, although not exactly to her liking, was working – much to the relief of Evelyn and Gloria. They both recognized that future plans were necessary, as Ruth's condition was sure to decline. The improved situation was temporary, and eventually it might not be possible for Ruth to stay safely at home – but that would be another chapter.

QUICK CRANBERRY TRIFLES

2 c cooked cranberry sauce (not jelly)
1/4 c sherry
1/2 c chilled heavy cream
1/2 c melted but cool vanilla ice cream
1 1/2 c cubed (1/2")
Stir together cranberry sauce and sherry in a bowl. Set aside.

Combine cream and ice cream in a bowl, then set over a larger bowl of ice and cold water and beat with an electric mixer until stiff.

Divide half of cake cubes among 4 dessert glasses. Top each serving with a scant 1/4 c cranberry mixture, then top each with 1/4 c whipped-cream mixture. Repeat layering with remaining cake cubes, cranberry mixture, and whipped-cream mixture.

Chill, loosely covered with plastic wrap, at least 8 hrs. for flavors to develop. Trifles can be chilled up to 1 day.

Yield: 4 dessert servings.

Putting Hebrew front and centre

The recent United Jewish Communities General Assembly, held in Toronto, was an illustration of both success and failure in the ongoing education of the Jewish People. It reminded me of the 1969 GA in Boston, where I was among a group of irreverent students holding signs that read: "If you can't read this sign, you're not a Jewish leader!" Of course, the signs were in Hebrew.

Seymour Epstein

A recent article by Rabbi Josh Elkin, the director of the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), calls for a fresh, intensive effort to increase Hebrew-language acquisition in all centres of Jewish life. He points to the strange paradox of Hebrew's rebirth in Israel as a fully functioning modern language on the one hand, and the decline of its curricular centrality in the largest and strongest Diaspora community that ever existed on the other. He quotes Shalom Spiegel from Hebrew Reborn in 1930: "Language is more than language. Within language lie the concealed magic forces of nature and history, a heritage of emotions, habits of thoughts, traditions of taste, inheritances of will – the imperative of the past."

At our recent GA, I witnessed a scion of one of the great philanthropic families in the American Jewish community quote a Baptist prayer book to illustrate an ancient Jewish value, covenant or brit. I wasn't even certain that the leader in question knew that the Christian source was quoting earlier Jewish references in the Hebrew Bible. A leader with a Hebraic education that paralleled her obviously sophisticated general education would not have erred in such a fashion.

On the other hand, I was privileged to spend the Shabbat before the GA with more than 300 Jewish students at an event sponsored by Hillel. And Hillel himself would have been proud, since these young people were not merely identifying with the beauty of Jewish life and civilization. They were actively living a Jewish weekend, proudly demonstrating their Jewish literacy in study, prayer and song, and preparing for a GA where they would quote Jewish sources in the original Hebrew.

There is hope.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Lost opportunities at the GA

URBAN WRITER

The 2005 General Assembly (GA), an annual conference sponsored by the United Jewish Communities, has come and gone. This year, it was held at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre and attended by representatives from Jewish federations across North America, as well as Israeli and international organizational figures and politicians, members of smaller non-governmental agencies, students and artisans.

The GA has always been an impressive and complex undertaking, requiring the skills of hundreds of professionals and volunteers to plan and implement what is tantamount to erecting a highrise building every year.

The event, which was preceded by a multi-denominational Shabbat program attended by Hillel students, included three days of workshopping on issues such as "Endowing the Jewish Future" and "Israel: The Brand."

Private meetings of the "Jewish who's who" took place around the clock, and thousands of square feet were reserved for creative booths exhibiting Judaica and featuring dozens of non-profits such as Magen David Adom and Yeshiva University (which staged a hilarious Jewish parody of the TV quiz show Jeopardy).

The GA, with all its majesty and valuable networking, reflected the complexities and challenges facing the Jewish world – mostly defined, however, through the eyes of American Jewry. Indeed, flipping through the GA program, it was hard to find workshops involving Canadian Jewish professionals and lay leader panelists, other than a few of our shining lights such as Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Speaking with some local leadership involved in the GA, I was told that a list of requests for programs and speakers featuring Canadian Jewry and key issues that highlight our perspective on world Jewry had been denied.

By limiting Canadian Jewish input (and likely the input of other nations), the agenda and flavour of the GA was, in effect, controlled by American Jewish leadership, making it heavy on Hollywood form and light on advocacy for crucial issues such as Jewish education.

In short, the GA lacked a lot of Jewish soul!

This reality was made uncomfortably clear at the closing plenary, when a Jewish researcher from the western United States paraphrased the conclusions of a study she had conducted with a select group of Jewish youth about their perceptions of the Jewish world and what might lead them to strengthen their connection to it.

Most of the youths in her study placed their Jewishness fifth or sixth on their list of priorities, often less important than such values as vegetarianism or building a career. The American demographer said we should, therefore, "approach our Jewish youth in a non-Jewish manner"– by offering them fun and sexy events, and free or highly subsidized trips to Israel designed to increase their sense of entitlement, and bring a little hip hop to "Jewing it."

The GA lacked a riveting Jewish neshamah. It failed to capture the strength and beauty of the Jewish people found in the inspiring poetry of Yehuda Halevy or in the compelling thoughts of Maimonidies and Rabbi Akiva and the brave deeds of Israelis and Diaspora Jews who are active in building and securing our nation, Israel, and our people as a light unto the nations.

Perhaps if the American Jewish community better understood partnership as a process of inclusion – in this case combining high quality American production values and universalism with a Canadian Jewish commitment to Jewish education and "roll up your sleeves Judaism" – the GA might have waded into more risky Jewish waters and offered solutions to age-old challenges that would have spoken to our Jewish guts, and mesmerized and captured our Jewish minds.

The GA was magnificent in its stature and breadth, but like a golden temple, it often glittered in the sunlight while the pews remained empty inside.

Carnage in Netanya

A suicide bomber struck at a shopping mall in Netanya on Monday morning. At least five people were killed and some 50 people wounded. The mall's security guard prevented a much larger atrocity by stopping the murderer from entering the building. Media blitz proposed to halt population decline

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jerry Maser comes across as an upbeat, glass-half-full kind of guy, but as a marketing maven with a longstanding knowledge of getting people's attention, he's not averse to quoting some pretty depressing statistics to make his point.

Take this one, for example: worldwide, the Jewish population is on a downward spiral with little sign of reversal. If trends continue, there won't be any Jews left in 250 years.

Then there's this: how would you feel if every day the media reported that 150 Jews – the projected reduction in Jewish numbers based on demographic trends – had been killed by terrorists?

Or how about this one: the Jewish singles population in the Greater Toronto Area numbers some 56,000, while the grand total of those attending all the community's singles programs over the past few years is 2,000.

And then there's this: in a generation or two, there won't be a critical mass of self-defining Jews to occupy the gleaming new facilities being constructed in the Toronto area.

Judith Weinroth and Jerry Maser

And finally: no one has a clue how to address the problem of declining Jewish numbers.

Canada changes UN votes on Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada has shifted its votes at the United Nations in support of Israel for the second consecutive year, and while community officials welcome the new direction, they are demanding more and holding Prime Minister Paul Martin to his earlier pledge to reform the UN.

Canada last week changed its votes on three resolutions at the UN General Assembly's annual debate on the Palestinian issue, adding to Ottawa's shift toward Israel on four other resolutions last year.

Seen as a 'step in the right direction'

And in a reprise of a stern rebuke to the world body delivered last year by Canadian ambassador Alan Rock, Gilbert Laurin, Canada's chargé d'affaires at the UN, slammed this year's litany of anti-Israel measures as "divisive and unhelpful."

The 20 or so Arab-sponsored resolutions are expected to pass anyway when the session ends sometime next month.

Canada changed its vote from abstention to opposition on the resolution that provides support to a committee on Palestinian rights. Canada said it believes scarce UN resources "should only be committed to bodies that can clearly demonstrate achievements in support of the peace process."

Canada also changed its vote, from support to abstention, on the resolution on the "Peaceful Settlement of the Question of Palestine." Laurin said the measure required "a stronger and more unequivocal condemnation of suicide bombing."

Finally, on the resolution called "The Syrian Golan," Canada changed its vote from

Bank CEO Honoured

MONTREAL — Real Raymond, president and CEO of the National Bank of Canada, was honoured by B'nai Brith Canada, Quebec region, with its Award of Merit last week at a fundraising dinner attended by some 1,000 people. It was co-chaired by the 2004 honoree, Michael Sabia, president and CEO of Bell Canada Enterprises. B'nai Brith regional director Bill Surkis cited Raymond for his "success in the business world and his contributions to the educational, social and cultural spheres of our community."

USDS In Vaughan

TORONTO — United Synagogue Day School has signed an agreement with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to build a branch at the new Vaughan Jewish community campus, the school said last week. USDS said it will move into its building next to a new community centre and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's new northern branch in September 2008.

WORLD

Leftists Back Israel

ROME — Left-wing Italians have started a national pro-Israel group. At a conference last month, Piero Fassino, secretary of the Democratic Party of the Left, announced the formation of the nationwide Left Wing for Israel. A local Left Wing for Israel group was founded in Milan a few years ago. "We must work to recognize that in the Middle East there are not one right and one wrong in conflict, but two rights: the right of Israel to exist and the right of the Palestinian people to have their own homeland," Fassino said.

BBC Raps Reporter

LONDON — The BBC censured one of its reporters for saying she cried at the decline of the late Yasser Arafat. The BBC Governors Program Complaints Committee said in a statement issued Nov. 26 that Barbara Plett had "breached the requirements of due impartiality" in her dispatch of Oct. 30, 2004, which described the ailing Palestinian leader's departure to a French hospital where he later died. "When the helicopter carrying the frail old man rose from his ruined compound, I started to cry," Plett said in her report broadcast on the From Our Own Correspondent program. The BBC panel, which said it had received hundreds of complaints against Plett, noted she had also made mention of Arafat's "obvious failings."

Court Upholds Award

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court last week allowed a $116 million judgment against the PLO and Palestinian Authority to stand. The high court chose not to block a judgment in favour of the family of a U.S. citizen and his Israeli wife who were killed in a 1996 drive-by shooting in the West Bank. A federal court in Rhode Island had found the ruling Palestinian organizations responsible for the attack because they gave safe haven to Hamas. The federal court ruled in a default judgment after several PLO leaders, including late PA President Yasser Arafat, refused requests for depositions. Yaron and Efrat Ungar were returning from a wedding when they were killed.

Siblings Cleared

LONDON — The brother and sister of a British terrorist were cleared of complicity in his plan to blow up Mike's Place bar in Tel Aviv in April 2003. Zahid and Parveen Sharif, whose brother, Omar, was one of two Britons who attacked the bar, were acquitted Nov. 28 by London's Old Bailey Court. Sharif's partner blew himself up, killing three Israelis, but Sharif's bomb failed to detonate and he fled. He later drowned at sea. The court found there was insufficient evidence that e-mails from Sharif to his siblings constituted advance notice of a terror plot, so they couldn't be convicted of failing to inform authorities.

Moscow Bans Anti-fascist March

MOSCOW — The city of Moscow's decision to ban an anti-fascist march slated for Nov 27 was criticized.

"The authorities have made it clear to us who they consider as their allies. Anti-fascists are not counted among them," the march organizing committee said in a statement.

The proposed march was seen by its initiators as a response to the Nov. 4 procession of some 1,000 ultra-nationalists in downtown Moscow with xenophobic and anti-Semitic banners and chanting.

The participants in that march – which was held with the city's permission – also called for Russia to cleanse itself of immigrants and non-Russian minorities. Some of them were seen giving Nazi salutes and sporting swastikas.

On Nov. 27, police briefly detained some of the organizers of the anti-fascist event for holding an unapproved rally near the Moscow mayor's office to protest the cancellation of the anti-fascist march.

Jewish voters weigh familiar issues

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Backgrounder

"Who wants to campaign in the slush?" groused Pierre Trudeau during his brief stint as leader of the Opposition in 1980.

Not many did, but the winter vote did return Trudeau to the prime minister's chair for four more years.

Paul Martin is obviously hoping for the same fate, as Canadians prepare to slog through their first winter election in 25 years — one some pundits are predicting will change the political landscape negligibly, if at all.

For Jewish voters, there has been no let-up in the national debate over which party is best for Israel and which most faithfully reflects Jewish values for a better Canada.

In the coming days, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada will issue their customary election guides, in which several key issues will be identified for local and national candidates: fighting anti-Semitism; security and anti-terrorism measures; social issues, including poverty and housing; responses to the crisis in Darfur; citizenship revocation and war criminals; and the school funding issue in Ontario.

Similarly, the Canada-Israel Committee will put out a guide to issues that touch on bilateral relations between Canada and Israel in several areas, as well as the peace process and Canada's voting record at the United Nations.

Israel registered as a soft election issue even before the vote was called. Last month, in an enthusiastically received speech at the United Jewish Communities' General Assembly in Toronto, Martin got the ball rolling with a stirring endorsement of the Jewish state.

"Israel's values are Canada's values... shared values of democracy, the rule of law and the protection of human rights," he said.

The prime minister also pledged that Canada will help end the "annual ritual of politicized anti-Israel resolutions" at the United Nations.

A week later, though, he was rebuked at the annual Canadian Arab Federation reception, held at the National Press Club in Ottawa. Before all four national party leaders, acting CAF president Faraj Nakleh stressed that Canada "does not share common values with some countries – like Israel – who break international law and whose human rights record is clearly questionable."

But Martin didn't flinch, saying in his speech, "Canada is a friend to the Arab world. Canada is a friend to Israel. At times, we will speak frankly to either side. Out ultimate goal is the goal I believe everyone holds, and that is for peace in the Middle East."

Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper sounded pretty much the same tone, saying his party "believes that Canada must pursue a balanced approach in its policy towards the Middle East."

Reportedly, Bloc Quebecois leader Gilles Duceppe and the NDP's Jack Layton won hearty applause when they accused Israel of illegally occupying lands in the Middle East.

But is Israel a fulcrum issue for Jewish voters? According to McGill University sociologist Morton Weinfeld, there's no hard answer.

"It's not clear to what extent Jews are influenced by a candidate or party based on their support for Israel," Weinfeld told The CJN.

And while there's a perception that Canadian Jews tend, for the most part, to vote for Liberals, "we don't have consistent, long-term data on Canadian Jewish voting patterns."

Both the Liberals and Conservatives "are seen as reasonably supportive" of Israel. While some pro-Israel Jews vote for the New Democrats, "Jews who support the NDP are generally not basing that support on [the party's] Middle East policy," Weinfeld said.

Since becoming leaders of their respective parties, both Martin and Conservative leader Stephen Harper have expressed strong, and sometimes strident, support for the Jewish state.

The Tories "have always taken fairly strong positions in support of Israel," Weinfeld pointed out. "And there is a perception that the Liberals under Martin have been more sensitive to the Jewish community's concerns on Israel."

Is it fair?

From the editor's desk

Covering national elections is particularly challenging for a weekly paper. We can keep pace with patterns and trends, but we cannot keep pace with daily developments.

Nor can we be comprehensive.

Limitations of space in the paper and the relentless forward tug of an immovable Monday-morning deadline militate against it.

We must therefore be selective.

As in past years, our election coverage will fall into three categories:

• Interviews with the leaders of the main parties where such interviews are made available to us;

• Thumbnail profiles of the ridings across the country where significant numbers of Jews live; and

• Occasional campaign notes and other election-related observations in this column.

As many letters-to-the-editor as possible will be published. We will do our best to publish a cross-section of partisan opinions we receive from readers, but we will not publish correspondence that is merely a substitute for personal invective or ad personam attack.

Including this issue, there are six issues of The CJN before election day, Monday Jan. 23 (The CJN's press-day). In today's issue, Ron Csillag has written a broad roundup of the issues of special interest to the Jewish community.

Notes and observations

One of the quizzical aspects of this election, and of the last four federal elections, is the exaggerated deference paid to the Bloc Québécois and its leader – now Gilles Duceppe – by our national media.

The Bloc is not a national party, and yet it and Duceppe are treated as if it were. The Bloc runs candidates in only 75 ridings. Duceppe's travel requirements are considerably less rigorous than the other leaders. He campaigns only within the boundaries of Quebec, while the other leaders campaign a mari usque ad mare, from sea to sea.

His sole goal, it is important to remind ourselves, is the separation of Quebec from Canada. He serves only Quebec voters and has scant regard, if any, for the voters in the other provinces and territories. His interests are regional. His focus is regional. His efforts are regional.

Writing about the Bloc's platform, the Globe and Mail reported the following last week: "Mr. Duceppe said he will continue to argue in favour of a sovereign Quebec, and pointed out that a large Bloc victory on Jan. 23 will provide a boost to the sovereigntist movement."

And therein, of course, lies the crux of the matter. Canadians live in fear of causing offence to the vacillating "soft" federalist/separatist Québécois, who probably make up one-third of Quebec's population, and in whose hands, it is no exaggeration to say, possibly rests the fate of Canadian confederation.

The spectre of a third referendum looms very large on Quebec's provincial political horizon. The new Parti Québécois leader, though untested, is popular. The current, and sorely tested, Liberal premier is decidedly unpopular.

A sweeping victory by the Bloc in the majority of Quebec's 75 federal ridings, it is feared, will provide all the noisy propulsion necessary to get the separatist dirigible off the ground to ominously cloud Canada's skies once again.

The only real campaign agenda for the Bloc, despite any protestations to the contrary by its leader, will be to pry as many of those vacillating Quebec voters away from the federalist alternatives in Quebec.

Even on the very first day of the election campaign, many commentators observed and wrote that national unity is one of its key underlying themes.

Duceppe is trying to create the "winning conditions," if only psychological, for the next referendum.

It is, therefore, not fairness, or even the politeness and courtesy for which Canadians are so famous, that drives our national media and other institutions to be deferential toward Duceppe. If fairness were the motivating factor, then Jim Harris whose Green Party is fielding candidates in each of the 308 federal ridings, would be treated with greater consideration and respect.

It's the fear of that separatist dirigible.

And thus, Duceppe will be one of the four leaders invited to take part in the televised debates. The television networks will assign a reporter to travel with his campaign team each day. And the nightly newscasts will give him equal coverage to that of the true national party leaders.

But it's not really fair.

Israeli rabbi addresses human rights abuses

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

He has been stoned by Jewish settlers, manhandled by Israeli security forces in the West Bank, and threatened with death.

As a result, Rabbi Arik Ascherman, executive director of Rabbis for Human Rights (RHR), sometimes wonders whether he should carry on.

"What we do is not fun," he acknowledged in a recent speech on Jewish values and human rights at the Morris Winchevsky Centre. "As an Israeli Jew and a Zionist, there is no great pleasure in dealing with the darkest corners of the country I love."

Rabbi Ascherman, who has challenged orders to bulldoze Palestinian homes, said, "There are many days when I wake up and ask myself, 'Can't a nice Jewish boy do something better than to stand in front of a bulldozer?' It's not fun."

Yet Rabbi Ascherman, whose organization describes itself as "the rabbinic voice of conscience in Israel," is determined to press on.

In a reference to the forthcoming Chanukah holiday, he said, "When everything is dark, you have to light the first candle."

A Harvard University and Hebrew Union College graduate, he has been associated with RHR since making aliyah in 1994. Founded in 1988 by Reform Rabbi David Forman as a non-partisan, apolitical group, RHR strives to address human rights abuses, both in Israel and the territories.

In the West Bank, RHR works to protect Palestinian rights by trying to prevent home demolitions and the uprooting of Palestinian olive groves by Jewish settlers.

In Israel, RHR strives to promote policies to alleviate poverty. "Economic justice is also a human right," he noted.

Rabbi Ascherman was born and raised in Erie, Penn., and brought up in a fourth-generation Reform home with a fervent belief in universal social justice.

In Israel, he said, he discovered that it is not a value shared by all Israelis, especially religious Jews.

Rabbi Ascherman, who is married to Einat Ramon, the first woman ordained as a Conservative rabbi in Israel, said that Judaism cannot and must not tolerate the oppression of any human being.

He said that RHR brings its message of universal human rights to schools, army camps, the media and public campaigns in Israel.

Sometimes, RHR engages in civil disobedience. Last March, Rabbi Ascherman was found guilty of interfering in two Palestinian home demolitions. He is appealing the verdict on the grounds that his trial was illegitimate because the law that convicted him is "racist."

"Law and justice in the Bible are synonymous," he said, "but in our world, this is not the case."

Home demolitions, he added, are wrong. "There comes a point when you have no choice but to stand before the bulldozers."

Rabbi Ascherman charged that the destruction of Palestinian olive groves cannot be justified on security grounds. They are far away from roads and, therefore, cannot be used as cover for terrorists planning to attack Jewish motorists.

RHR, he said, attempts to replant groves uprooted by settlers.

Speaking of poverty in Israel, Rabbi Ascherman said that 20 per cent of the elderly are chronically hungry, while upward of 20 per cent of children live in impoverished conditions.

Due to government policy, more and more Israelis must survive without the safety net of social benefits, he said.

Rabbi Ascherman called for an end to Israel's occupation of the West Bank, saying it is a significant factor in causing human rights violations.

The Palestinians are entitled to statehood in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, he said.

In a reference to the route of Israel's West Bank security barrier, he issued this recommendation: "Build it on the Green Line, not in hostile territory."

The sparks that touched off the first Palestinian uprising in 1987 – generally the anger of living under occupation – may yet reignite in a third intifadah, he warned.

Israel has a vital interest in protecting Palestinian human rights, he said. "We'll either live together or die together."

Countering accusations that RHR undermines Israel, Rabbi Ascherman declared, "We are not anti-Israel."

The task of good Zionists, he pointed out, is to work for an Israel that is militarily and morally strong.

WHAT MAKES A GREAT SCHOOL GREAT?

I was very fortunate to have had the opportunity to attend Associated as a student thanks to the commitment of my parents and financial assistance from UJA Federation and the school. I received an excellent foundation that helped to establish my Jewish identity and responsibility for fellow Jews. This foundation was a significant factor in my decision later in life to pursue a career as a Jewish communal professional at UJA Federation.

My wife Leslie, also an Associated grad, and I decided to send our two children, Shira and Noah, to Associated to give them the same opportunities we had – to learn, experience and explore their Jewish heritage and traditions. We believe that Associated is a great school – pluralistic and accepting with the traditional Torah values that are essential for the continuity of our people.

Shulman helps steer Congress' policy agenda

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A few days after Steven Shulman took over as regional director and general counsel of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, all heck broke loose.

The McGuinty government announced it was banning sharia- and all faith-based family law arbitration and requiring that such arbitrations be governed by Ontario law and conducted by licensed and trained personnel.

"The government went in an unexpected direction and we had to analyze the legalities and how it affected the community," Shulman said.

Shulman and other professional staff at Congress, along with lay leaders and representatives of other affected groups, met to discuss a unified community response. It was the kind of issue for which he could throw both his hats into the ring – as a lawyer discussing the legal aspects of the provincial decision, and as regional director, discussing the policy dimensions.

Talk about being in the right place at the right time. The brainstorming over issues that touch the lives of many people in the Jewish community was the kind of policy involvement that attracted him back to Congress in the first place.

Shulman, who served as Congress' associate national director of community relations and assistant counsel from 1993 to 1997, said he returned to CJC because "the Congress agenda is very exciting and meaningful. You see results that affect not just the Jewish community, but the broader community."

"You can affect the quality of life for all people in Ontario," he said.

In the initial response to the premier's bombshell, Congress criticized the way the decision was unveiled in a media interview and lamented the lack of consultation. Later, it called on the provincial government to hold public hearings on its proposed legislation so that groups such as Congress could provide input on how the regulations that will enforce the law are implemented.

The "key issue for us, the most important issue as we see it in Ontario, is the unequal, the unfair school funding regime in the province," Shulman said.

It's another a subject that includes legal and policy components. Congress has hired an education policy advisor, Jesse Guberman, who is meeting with stakeholders in the Jewish community for their input in a comprehensive plan that Congress will advance to government when it makes it pitch for the province to fund Jewish schools, Shulman said.

The proposal, when it's ready, will not simply demand government funds. It will also present "a specific, concrete proposal," he said.

Congress, along with Ontario federated communities and UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, will push the point that the current system, in which Roman Catholic schools are favoured with full government funding while other religious groups get nothing, is manifestly unfair and unequal, Shulman said.

Steven Shulman

"Society needs to look at this as a human rights issue. It's much deeper than simply an education policy issue."

In addition, any solutions proposed by community organizations won't undermine the public system – a concern voiced by many opponents of funding for non-Catholic schools, he said.

Shulman, who practised immigration law while in private practice, said his other duties include responding to anti-Semitic outbreaks when they occur and countering stereotypes about Jews by promoting education programs in schools.

An offshoot of that issue is Congress' work, in conjunction with federated Jewish communities in Ontario, to encourage all levels of government to find ways to help communities address their security concerns.

The Jewish community, he noted, is the only one that must hire guards for its religious institutions. Congress believes government authorities should help underwrite some of those security costs, as is done in the United States, he said.

Shulman said he continues to work with other communities throughout the province on issues such as elder care, home care, more beds for seniors in residences, and he plans to visit smaller communities to keep up with their concerns.

Congress' effectiveness is enhanced when it can show it represents citizens throughout the province and not only in the major cities, he said.

Progress noted, more required

Many Canadians will not be pleased that the government only partially reversed its voting record last week on the resolutions that reflexively, unfairly condemn Israel at the United Nations General Assembly. Of course, some Canadians will not be pleased that the government reversed itself at all, even partially.

In our view, however, the government deserves to be commended for continuing the process it began last year of reassessing and readjusting its votes in the annual let's-demonize-Israel ritual in the General Assembly.

Canada changed its votes on three resolutions, shifting from abstention to outright opposition on two resolutions, and from previous support to abstention on a third. These votes were in conjunction with the change in four of the votes last year.

Deputy Ambassador Gilbert Laurin told the General Assembly last Thursday that Canada would vote against three more of the "divisive and unhelpful" resolutions this year. Laurin "strongly" encouraged resolutions that are more constructive, without "inflammatory, provocative and divisive language."

To be sure, Canada needs to make more progress in aligning its UN votes more squarely with fundamental guideposts of fairness and good conscience. But we must also acknowledge the forward movement in the incomplete path of that progress.

Marc Gold, the national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee characterized the changed Canadian votes last week as "a step in the right direction." But he also pointed out that "there's much more that needs to be done in order to address structural and systemic problems," at the United Nations."

B'nai Brith Canada too called the votes a "welcome first step" while urging a "zero-tolerance" policy on Israel-bashing at the UN.

Laurin said that Canada "will not support resolutions that use emotive and provocative language in place of the straight facts." He also indicated that Canada is working toward fewer, more focused and more balanced resolutions.

Three weeks ago, Prime Minister Paul Martin told the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities that Canada " will continue to press for reforms at the United Nations that will prevent the politicization of the organization." The shift in Canada's UN voting over the past two years is part of that process. That process, however, must not stop.

It is vital for the ultimate repair of the flawed UN institution. But it is even more important for its own sake and for the sake of Canada – that the world see no discrepancy between the democratic, freedom-loving values Canada stands for and the actions that would affirm those values.

Trudeau ignoring the facts

Alexandre (Sacha) Trudeau has evidently ignored the facts about Israel successfully bringing modernization to the Palestinian territories, including electrification, farming techniques and modern health clinics, which have drastically reduced infant mortality. ("Trudeau's Mideast documentary draws fire," CJN, Nov. 24) These efforts were also accompanied by Israeli (some successful, some not) efforts to bring home-grown industry into the territories. All of this has taken place under the shadow of "deep manipulation" by former Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and the Arab world in general. Although I personally advocate for the Palestinians to control their own affairs via an independent state, to blame Israel for savage behaviour on the part of Palestinians and Arabs (far more of whom have killed each other) that predated the existence of Israel is just another piece of feel-good political correctness that has no basis in reality.

School funding

My family has been receiving The CJN for many years.

I have been going to public schools my whole life, but my cousins go to Jewish schools. In the article "Jews join other faiths at school funding rally" (CJN, Nov. 24), it states that Catholic schools are publicly funded, while other religious schools are not. I was not aware of that fact until now. I researched the topic more and discovered that our tax dollars go towards either public or Catholic schools. I believe that we should be able to decide where our money goes, whether it is a public school or any religious school.

I have grown up learning that Ontario promotes fairness and equality. After reading that article, I have serious doubts about whether I was lied to or not. I hope I will be proven wrong.

We don't need religion

Bernard Baskin's column "Why we still need religion," (CJN, Oct. 27) is an appeal for our community not to dispense with religion in spite of the crimes committed in its name throughout history.

He maintains that one of the chief and unending functions of religion is to seek answers to "the eternal mysteries," namely the riddles of the cosmos, our relationship to life and our role and goal in life.

In spite of his denigration of science, which he asserts strips us of our soul, it's my view that it's only through the constant research of scientists that the answers to such questions can be found, and not in the primitive and mystical explanations that we have found comfort in through the centuries.

As to the view that ethical wisdom is only to be found in the Bible, why is it not possible that man as a thinking being is capable of working out an ethical system of living without the help of an ancient book written by men many thousands of years ago?

The view that "humanity's fragile grip on goodness easily slips" without religion ignores the fact that through the ages evil has most often been perpetrated by the most fervent believers.

Critical of Cotler

Although Senator Marcel Prud'homme is undoubtedly technically wrong in suggesting that Justice Minister Irwin Cotler vets every word, comma and paragraph of the Liberal Mideast policy, he is correct in substance ("Senators spar over Mideast policy, CJN, Dec. 1). Cotler, by his position as justice minister, and by his respected status within the Jewish community, represents Canadian Jews to the Liberal Party. Yet, when our government votes against Israel in seven of nine UN votes, he says nothing. So although Cotler does not literally write the anti-Israel mideast policy, his lack of input effectively writes the policy against the interests of Canadian Jewry.

Promoting a misbegotten film

I must express my shock and dismay that The CJN devoted nearly an entire page to the review of Paradise Now, a film that American Mideast analyst Daniel Pipes has declared a whitewash of Arab terrorism ("Two films show the faces of suicide bombers and their victims," CJN, Nov. 10). But your reviewer floats through his review without a word of condemnation for the portrayal of the two suicide bombers as men with a mission and a conscience. The CJN also saw fit to include a promotional photo with the article that portrayed the killers as well-dressed, clean-cut young men. Sorry, but terrorism by any other name is still barbarism. By what moral logic did The CJN decide to promote such a misbegotten film?

The ethics of exhibiting human remains

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Opening remarks from a Nov. 30 panel discussion at the Ontario Science Centre about "Body Worlds 2," an exhibit of some 200 "plastinated" human body parts and human bodies in lifelike poses now on display at the centre. Also on the panel were Muslim Imam Abdul Hai Patel, York University anthropology professor Kathryn Denning, University of Toronto ethics professor Patrick O'Hara, Richard David of the Mohawk Council of Akwesasne, and exhibit creator Dr. Gunther von Hagens.

Jewish tradition, from the standpoint of which I'm speaking tonight, regards respect for the body, dead no less than alive, as a cardinal principle. Whatever else may constitute a person, the body is an inextricable part of it. This means, in the case of dead bodies, swift burial with dignity and care. For even when the body is no longer animated, it's still part of the person.

Dr. Gunther von Hagens

We've all seen on TV Orthodox Jews in Israel, members of a voluntary organization called ZAKA, on the scene of terrorist attacks religiously – literally – collecting even the smallest of human remains to make sure that they're properly buried.

For Judaism, the human body is sacred. This means that it never ceases to belong to God. We're only its custodians, never its owners. According to the book of Deuteronomy, even a person impaled as punishment for his capital offence must be taken down from the stake before nightfall and given a proper burial. As the text has it: "For an impaled body is an affront to God" (Deuteronomy 21:23).

The human body, so Jewish sages taught, is God's twin: to abuse the body is to abuse God; to respect the body is to sanctify God. Those in the Jewish community who occupy themselves with preparing bodies for burial and burying them with dignity are said to be members of a chevrah kadishah, a holy society.

In biblical times, bodies that were not buried in Jerusalem ended up in the Valley of Hinnom. The Hebrew for "valley" is geh. The Valley of Hinnom in Hebrew is gehinnom, in Greek and Latin it became gehenna – hell. There are references to it in the Hebrew Bible, the New Testament and the Qur'an.

As I walked through the exhibit, which for me was a burdensome condition for participating in this debate, I felt that I was visiting hell, well-lit and spacious – yet hell.

But it's not my feelings and views, or yours, that matter. For it's the dead body that should be the sole subject of this discussion. I've already indicated that to say that the dead body is only dead matter is alien to my tradition. It's also a cynical view. After all, we don't say this about works of art. When Taliban fanatics desecrated statues of Buddha, works of stone and clay made by human hands, the world was incensed for good reason, for these statues represented more than inanimate matter. How much more should that be true of human bodies, yet I've seen no similar reactions when bodies are flayed and emptied of their blood by way of a new technique. Because we can do it, so the argument goes, we must do it. Morality thus becomes subservient to expediency.

Because my tradition teaches that the human body is a gift from God that must be returned to God – "from dust to dust" – it also prohibits having any gain, direct or indirect, from the human body – whether it's trading in live parts, exhibiting dead ones or paying to come to look at them. The excuse that it's scientific, educational or entertaining doesn't wash, for it confuses aesthetics and teaching with morality.

In the same way as we recoil at the experimentation on the live bodies that the infamous Dr. Mengele and others conducted in the Nazi camps in the guise of scientific experiments, so we have reason to recoil at the ostensibly scientific treatment of dead bodies. And as the responsible scientific community has consistently refused to use the data Mengele and his gang collected, so should we, I believe, refuse to collude in this treatment of dead bodies by turning ourselves into witnesses to human degradation in the name of education or entertainment, or some other excuse.

> 'For Judaism, the human body is sacred. This means that it never ceases to belong to God.'

The argument that the people exhibited here voluntarily agreed to this treatment is difficult to fathom. Do we really know their state of mind, their despair at the time of the alleged permission? And did the body parts exhibited also give permission?

The fact that a respectable museum colludes with the spectacle suggests that the decent and the moral has given way to the allegedly aesthetic and reportedly instructive. As long as a body is evocatively displayed, it becomes acceptable, we're given to understand.

We're told that to describe this as a bizarre combination of necromancy and pornography is to overreact. Sobriety and good manners are seen as more appropriate than moral outrage – another sign of the times.

This doesn't mean that I'm opposed to autopsies and transplants. For if a body or a body part can save another life, it may, nay should, be used, for it then comes to serve forces that make for life. In such cases, God has not been impaled but affirmed as the source of life. It's frivolous and wanton autopsies, especially for the purpose of display, that I find so difficult. Couldn't plastic replicas have achieved the same result?

The quest for the ostensibly aesthetic and the allegedly scientific is so powerful in our society that it seems to have intimidated and muzzled representatives of religious communities. Even if the free society in which we live must not allow them to try to stop this kind of spectacle, and even though religion – not always for the worse – has ceased to have power, churches, mosques, synagogues and temples could have joined forces in urging their own adherents to stay away and given reasons for it. Though there has been some of it, there hasn't been enough.

I'm aware of the fact that, given the climate of opinion in which we find ourselves today, my participation in this debate is quixotic. But that's no reason to remain silent.

Editor's note: It is a very rare occasion when The CJN publishes an essay by one of its regular columnists. The subject of Rabbi Marmur's address and the circumstances under which he delivered it are one such occasion.

The Muslim point of view

From a written statement by Imam Abdul Hai Patel, co-ordinator of the Islamic Council of Imams-Canada, enunciating the Islamic position on the Body Worlds 2 exhibit.

[Body Worlds 2] is a willful desecration of the human body. Islam enjoins utmost dignity and respect for the human body, dead or alive, and a female corpse especially should not be visibly uncovered.

The display is traumatizing for many, and its viewing needs to be restricted to adults only.

While we accept the educational component, the same purpose can be accomplished by producing replicas with material depicting natural original figures… Use of actual bodies, if required, should be confined to students of science in classrooms only, not in a public space for public viewing.

Organ donation is permitted only for saving human lives, with some exceptions for research. Donating bodies for the purpose of exhibition is prohibited.

The economic success of this exhibition can result in further trafficking in human bodies, defeating its educational objectives.

Opinions

Facing fanatics

Religion brings out the worst in us when it is fanatic and the best when it is pragmatic.

The worst manifests itself as idolatry: turning the partial and temporary – the work of human minds and hands – into something total, eternal, even divine. That is how ostensibly passionate defenders of the faith become idol-worshippers in the guise of being ultra-religious.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

In their important book, Idolatry, Israeli philosophers Moshe Halbertal and Avishai Margalit assert that "the prohibition against idolatry entails not only a ban on the worship of other gods but also a ban on certain ways of representing the right God."

Idolatry is not only "out there." It can also be in our own hearts and minds. That is why so many decent people, including Jews, admire and support religious fanatics.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel defined an idol as "any god who is mine but not yours, any god concerned with me but not with you." For him, "to act in the spirit of religion is to unite what lies apart, to remember that humanity as a whole is God's beloved child." Fanatics despise people who do not share their passions.

The Jewish ideal of shalom comes from the Hebrew word that means "to make whole." Idolatry separates and puts asunder, while true faith unites and makes whole. The idolatry of fanatics will always make for conflict, whereas faith makes for peace. Hence the intolerance and belligerence – the extremism – of fanatics, Jewish ones no less than others.

The enemy of truth is certainty no less than it is falsehood. People who make dogmatic pronouncements about what God really wants will find it impossible to work with those who do not share their certainties.

Instead of co-operation, fanatics seek domination. They are prisoners of their own certainties. They can only impose themselves on others, never co-operate.

Fanatics need "leaders," real or imaginary. For it is easier to be certain when others tell you what to be certain about. By ascribing superhuman qualities to human mortals whom they "must" obey, they shield themselves from their own responsibility of trying to do what is right.

Normative Judaism is text-based, not leader-based. The Torah of Moses is perfect but, as it often demonstrates, Moses is not. Those who invent and glorify saints, and identify messiahs, distort Judaism.

Purveyors of certainty describe my pragmatic religious liberalism as wishy-washy. People who want to be commandeered, not taught, believe them. For me, however, to be a liberal is a badge of honour bestowed on those who seek to pursue God's truth wherever it is to be found, free from dogma and prejudice.

The most effective way I know to combat fanatics is to remain true to my liberal convictions.

My grandfathers, my heroes

University is typically a place for young adults to take steps in discovering who they are really meant to be.

This is much more easily said then done.

When a student enters the roller-coaster ride of university life, they have their own wacky goals, which may include bars, women/men, sports and more women/men, but, they are also mindful of important long-term objectives such as confirming their values, career path and even finding that special someone to eventually start a family with. (I can't believe the idea of starting a family is in my column – that's terrifying!)

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

Regardless, before even discussing where we're headed, it's valuable to consider where our inspiration comes from and who has influenced us in the past and still does today. Role models are critical for shaping our sense of self and our future. They are people who have made an impact in our lives and have helped mould us into the fine young adults we see in the mirror each morning. Before getting stressed out and losing our young, and precious, strands of hair over what we're going to become, we must first figure out who we really are.

One way to help get there, to find out who we are, would be to ponder what makes you, you. Growing up, we adopt heroes, mentors and other inspirational people as our guides in life. We seek their help to lead us in the right direction. What we see in them, we often want to become.

As a youngster, I always saw athletes as omnipotent. They were the biggest, strongest, most skilled and wealthiest people I had ever been exposed to – so I would say, "When I grow up, I want to play in the NHL."

Well I'm 20 years old now, and guess what? I still want to play in the NHL. But I also possess the ability to think rationally, and I know that dream died faster than the speed of light. Anyway, athletes have not contributed to my development as a person. They just entertain me.

Today, I look to the people closest to me, whom I admire and respect, to help me become the outstanding adult I see myself becoming in the future. And it's my grandfathers who stand out when I think about heroes.

My zaide, Al Pottens, possesses the spark of the Energizer Bunny, and he is someone who, in his own quiet way, has reached hero status in my eyes. At 85 years young, he has been through a lot, but he maintains his strong, upbeat and cheerful personality. My zaide has had his fair share of bumps and bruises, both physically and personally, but he's as tough as ever. And beside the fact that he'll accidentally call me by the name of my old dog, Oreo, once in a while, his mind is clearer than a cloudless sky.

It's his ability to overcome all types of challenges and remain tough as nails that makes him a hero in my eyes. When I think of my zaide, I realize that life is not always perfect, but not being dragged down by a disappointment and moving on is key to maintaining a strong sense of self.

My other grandfather, Papa Mike, Mike Feldman – also known as Mike Feldman, deputy mayor of Toronto – happens to have a public profile, and he motivates me to become as successful as I know I can be. Through a lifetime of consistent achievements and successes, he has set the bar quite high for future generations in my family. I see this as a positive challenge for me. He exemplifies the meaning of excellence and inspires me, and likely a good portion of the City of Toronto, to fulfil our most desired wishes.

Like my zaide, Papa Mike has strong beliefs about right and wrong, and his ability to grasp the opportunities in tough situations and use them to make a contribution is particularly admirable.

My grandfathers exemplify the virtues of finding something positive to learn from life's experiences, and of not grouching about little nuisances – both important attributes.

Understanding what makes our heroes and mentors so successful is a major step toward understanding ourselves.

Bagel Day exploits our base instincts

Every Thursday, a great event brings together many Jews in a celebration of our unique culture and heritage. Welcome to Bagel Day at the Jewish Students' Association (JSA).

On these days, the JSA provides bagels, cream cheese and little plastic knives to anyone who wanders into its lounge, allowing them to enjoy the stereotypically Jewish goodness of fresh bagels and smoked-salmon cream cheese.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

From humble beginnings, Bagel Day has grown into a great success, bringing in Jew and non-Jew alike. On these days, I find myself wondering why people who don't normally hang out together are lured in by a 50-cent bagel and a spoonful of cream cheese.

Exhaustive research – that is, about 15 minutes of pondering – led me to this conclusion: people, in general, are cheap and lazy, and they like free stuff. Some individuals might not be like this, but, by and large, most people are.

Businesses appeal to these base instincts. We live in a world of sales, where everything eventually goes for a reduced price and nobody pays retail. "Employee pricing", "Buy one get one free", "Up to 50 per cent off", and "Everything must go." Companies are constantly hawking their wares at "discount" prices.

Some time ago, I went to buy a replacement computer part. The part was advertised for a very reasonable $150, but when I took it to the cashier, I was surprised to find that it rang in at $200. When I asked about the 33 per cent difference between the advertised price and my bill, I was told about a $50 "mail-in rebate."

Rather than advertise things at the price you must pay before you can leave the store, companies use the "mail-in rebate" to take advantage of our cheap and lazy natures. We read the price in the ad and we think, "Hey! That's cheap!" But when the time comes for us to mail in the rebate form, our lazy side often takes over.

I have read that something like 40 per cent of mail-in rebates go unclaimed by the lazy and unfortunate. Of those who do claim their rebates, some don't fill out the form in accordance with the offers' often inane rules (when asked to circle something, they square it, or they check-mark a box they were supposed to fill in), and some have handwriting that is too difficult to read, leading to their rebates being denied.

Personally, I hate mail-in rebates. Once the form is mailed off, all control leaves your hands. The only way to contact the company offering the rebate (because, of course, they are usually quite separate from the store where you bought the item) is by telephone. It takes 15 minutes of button mashing on the phone just to speak to a human being, and from there, things only get worse. It seems the ultimate goal of these phone systems is to either bore you to death, or to hold you off until you die of old age. The people who survive this weeding-out process are those few whose thrifty nature far outweighs their laziness and tendency toward frustration, and they are given anything they want to make them go away.

Another great tactic companies use is the "free with purchase of" doubletalk. Imagine a pet store that gives you a "free" leash or toy when you buy a pet. "Free" in this instance actually means "hidden cost." You can bet the store makes enough profit on the pet that the cost of the leash is hidden within it. We know this, because stores don't like to lose money, nor do they aim to do so. If you're buying a house with a driveway, the driveway doesn't come "free" – it's part of the cost of the house. Similarly, bicycles don't come with "free" tires and gears, and remote control toy cars don't come with "free" remote controls.

These gimmicks appeal to our thriftiness and take advantage of our laziness, stroking our egos while emptying our wallets.

So, it's important to remember the traits that Bagel Day appeals to, and the lessons it can teach us, like to always send in those rebates.

The Kirshner File

Popular novelist never imagined such success

Scott Turow's ascent to the rarefied status of bestselling author is a testament to the importance of persistence in the face of adversity.

Turow, here recently to promote his latest novel, Ordinary Heroes (HarperCollins), wrote his first book, The Way Things Are, in the early 1970s while attending Stanford University's prestigious creative writing centre. The still-unpublished novel, which is about an American draft dodger who flees to Canada to dodge military service in the Vietnam war, was rejected by no fewer than 25 publishers.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In retrospect, Turow believes that the rejection slips were not so much a commentary on his talent as a sign of national fatigue. "It was a decent first novel," he said, picking at his breakfast of French toast and coffee at the Park Hyatt Hotel. "It was not a failure of style. The problem was that it was a 'hippie' novel. I was writing about political activists when America was sick of the subject."

Nevertheless, Turow was devastated by the flurry of rejections, his self-esteem all but shattered. Until then, he had been a promising writer who had coasted into Stanford on a valued fellowship and chosen to be a writing instructor there. Yet the purgatory to which The Way Things Are was consigned did not destroy Turow's ambitions. As he put it, "They didn't kill the dream."

Burning to be a published novelist, he honed his craft as a contributor to literary journals. "I suffer from writing disease," he explained, his face wreathed in a sardonic expression. "I can't turn it off."

Since then, Turow, 56, has produced six novels apart from Ordinary Heroes – Presumed Innocent, The Burden of Proof, Pleading Guilty, The Laws of Our Fathers, Personal Injuries and Reversible Errors.

These contemporary courtroom novels, whose themes run the gamut from murder to corruption and deceit to romantic love, have been extraordinarily successful, having racked up global sales of 25 million in 25 languages and having been translated into two television mini series (Reversible Errors and The Burden of Proof) and one Hollywood movie (Presumed Innocent).

More film adaptations may be on the way. The actor Dustin Hoffman owns the rights to Personal Injuries, and although he has promised to convert it into a movie, Turow is still waiting for that blessed moment.

In addition to his novels, Turow has written One L, an insider's account of his first year at Harvard Law School, where hope and disappointment are, as one observer noted, "constant companions."

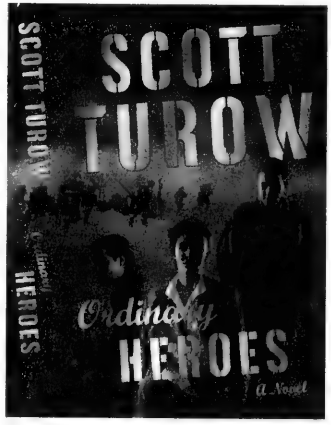
One L, Turow's first published book, appeared in 1977, two years after Turow gave up academia for the law. He decided to be a lawyer mainly out of a need for greater financial security, but there was another factor in the mix as well. "I felt I was lost in a barren wilderness and wanted something that would take me out of myself. I knew that being an English professor would not do that."

After graduating from Harvard, Turow was an assistant federal attorney in Chicago, where, in one high-profile case, he was prosecutor in the trial of the Illinois attorney general (who was eventually convicted of tax fraud). He was also lead counsel in an investigation of corruption in the state judiciary.

These trials were grist for Turow's mill. In 1987, he finally realized an adolescent dream when his first novel, Presumed Innocent, was published to critical and commercial acclaim.

"I never imagined I would be so successful," said Turow, a pleasant straight-talker. "I was astonished when Presumed Innocent landed on the New York Times' bestseller list. I was so unbelieving."

As might be expected, Turow is flattered by his popularity. But he hastened to point out that Tom Clancy's and John Grisham's novels have fared far better in terms of sales.



He believes that, with the breakdown of regionalism, readers are increasingly fascinated by courtroom dramas because the law is now the only uniformly respected forum in which questions of social value are resolved.

He wrote Presumed Innocent in his spare time after joining a Chicago law firm as a partner specializing in white-collar criminal litigation. Buoyed by its success, Turow drastically reduced his office hours.

Today, he practises 500 to 600 hours a year, mainly in pro-bono cases turning on the death penalty. "I have what I regard as a good balance in my life," said Turow, who is married to a painter with whom he has had three children.

Scott Turow

Hectic North American publicity book tours do not bother him. "There are worse things in life than people paying attention to you," he said, beaming. "It's better than taking depositions in Witchita."

Typically, he is at his desk from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m., but he does not work steadily. He answers e-mails and takes calls from his office, which can be irritating when his creative juices are flowing.

During the early stages, he writes whatever comes into his head. He may not even start at the beginning. "It's not a logical process because I'm basically disorganized. My imagination doesn't work in a linear fashion."

Being meticulous, Turow is big on voluminous research. "Tons of it," he said.

For Ordinary Heroes, which turns on the brutal nature of war and a family's secret history, he consulted army archives and talked with military personnel. But the stories he heard from his father, David, a field surgeon in the U.S. army during World War II in Europe, were his starting point.

"Like millions of returning soldiers, he came back with a sense that something had happened to him there. I knew it had been a profound, dynamic experience. It changed him."

David Turow – whose father had immigrated to the United States from czarist Russia around 1905 – stumbled into the Dachau and Bergen-Belsen concentration camps in Germany within days of their liberation by Allied troops. The ghastly sight of corpses stacked like cordwood startled and shocked him.

Dachau, in particular, came as a jolt because he thought it had been a political camp. "It was a disordering experience for him. I don't think he completely recovered from it."

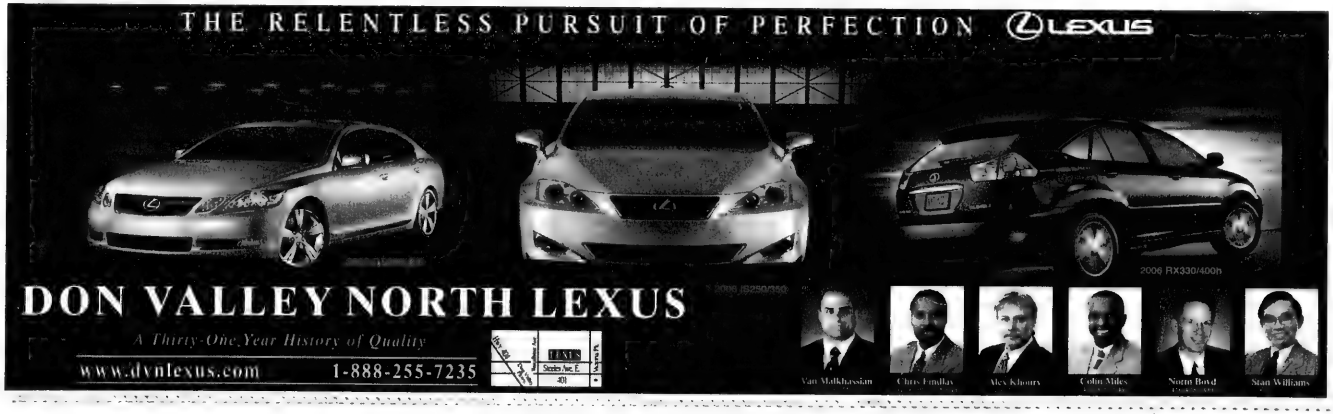
Turow's father, upon whom the main character in Ordinary Heroes is modelled, supposedly knew nothing about the Holocaust. Turow, however, is puzzled by his father's apparent ignorance. By the close of the war, the Holocaust was no longer shrouded in secrecy and was already an established fact.

His father's stories about the war doubtless had a significant impact on him. "Because I'm Jewish, the Holocaust has overshadowed my understanding of World War II," he explained. Yet Ordinary Heroes is hardly Turow's first novel where the Holocaust looms large. The Laws of our Fathers, in which a drive-by shooting embroils a judge in a bizarre, life-threatening series of events, features a Holocaust survivor.

Currently, Turow is working on a novella scheduled to run in the New York Times' Sunday magazine in the spring. He is also finishing a novel revolving around a judge who agonizes over a case. In the near future, he intends to write a novel about a man falsely accused of murdering his wife.

Having written Ordinary Heroes, a novel set during a war punctuated by genocide, Turow has returned to familiar terrain.

"I'm back in the courtroom," he said, his voice brimming with verve and self-confidence.



Community must reduce the tuition burden

Parents Speak

By WAYNE LEVIN

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto would like us to think that the primary solution to high and escalating Jewish day school tuition is to win the battle for government funding.

This position conveniently distracts attention away from federation's own culpability and failure to publicly commit to substantial improvements in Jewish day school education. But the burden of sending children to Jewish day schools can be alleviated considerably, and in relatively short order, if parents would speak up.

Up until just after the last provincial election, Jewish parents were receiving the benefit of some government funding through the Equity in Education Tax Credit – the result of an effort that was initiated, largely pursued and entirely funded by the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools.

In the months preceding and during the last provincial election campaign, Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty made it perfectly clear that he was going to repeal the tax credit if he were elected premier. Why didn't the federation, either directly or through its lobbying arm, the Canadian Jewish Congress, organize a public campaign to challenge now-Premier McGuinty? There were no petitions, no letter-writing campaigns and no rallies. Our self-appointed and unaccountable leaders did not generate any meaningful response whatsoever.

Moreover, parents did not see much benefit from the tax credit during its short life, as the Jewish day schools, with federation's approval, usurped any windfall by steadily increasing tuition.

Well before and since the demise of the tax credit, tuition increases have exceeded the rate of inflation – sometimes considerably – at schools affiliated with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE). If, for example, tuition had increased at the rate of inflation, the $4,950 in tuition charged by the Associated Hebrew Schools in 1990 would be less than $6,850 today, according to the Bank of Canada's inflation calculator. Why, then, is it now almost $10,000?

One, if not the primary, cause of this hyper-inflation is the cross-subsidization policies of the BJE and its funded schools. At one time, federation honourably bore the entire burden of subsidizing families who were not able to pay full tuition.

But federation abandoned this policy in the early 1990s when it froze its education funding, without consulting the community. By capping its contribution, the federation effectively denied day school parents the dignity of an affordable education.

Federation now provides only about half of all funds used to "subsidize" low and middle-income families. The other half comes primarily from families paying full tuition. In primary grades, parents unwittingly pay between $1,000 to $2,000 extra to support subsidies for others. In high schools, that range doubles. In this way, federation, in cahoots with the schools, places an obstacle in front of the blind while keeping them blind to begin with.

Though parents are expected to contribute through surcharged tuitions, federation does not allow them to take part in determining tuition subsidization guidelines. In fact, federation refuses to even disclose these guidelines. Perhaps it knows that many more families than actually apply would qualify for funding, and it fears there would be a rush on subsidy dollars, despite a humiliating application process that requires families to reveal intimate personal details.

The education tax credit is lost and we are not likely to get it, or anything like it, back under current political and community conditions. To change these conditions, and to bring about other changes that would considerably lessen the financial burden of educating our children – and increase standards where necessary – parents themselves must step up and hold the governing class of our community accountable – as do the federation's "major" contributors.

Day school parents are themselves major contributors. We annually raise tens of millions of dollars more than the entire UJA campaign, and we sacrifice day-in and day-out to make Jewish education a reality. Parents pay practically all of the education bills, so we – not unelected, anonymous members of the governing class at federation – should logically be the ones to determine the policies and priorities surrounding the education of our children.

Parents can take the first step by contacting the BJE at 416-633-7770 to demand transparent governance and full financial disclosure at the BJE and all its funded schools.

The transformation toward stable, affordable and high quality Jewish education is achievable, and it starts when parents make that call.

Wayne Levin has three children in Jewish day schools.

Toronto's Sages documents Orthodox rabbis, 1889-2004

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

To honour the memory of cantor, author, orator and historian Nosson (Nathan) Stolnitz, his grandson, Rabbi Mayer Abramowitz, has published Chachmei Yisrael of Toronto – Toronto's Sages.

The book, in English and Hebrew, features photographs and information about 48 Toronto and Ottawa Orthodox rabbis, including chassidic rabbis, who served between 1889 and 2004. As well, community leaders and rabbinical visitors to Toronto, among them the Satmar Rebbe and Rabbi Joseph Dov Soleveitchik, are remembered.

Rabbi Abramowitz said Toronto's Sages is the first such project to be published since Who's Who in Canadian Jewry some 40 years ago.

A New Haven, Conn., resident, Rabbi Abramowitz has followed in the footsteps of his family. His grandfather Nathan Stolnitz was a cantor and his uncle – his mother's brother, Samuel Stolnitz – served as the cantor at Holy Blossom Temple.

His father, Eliyahu Shmuel Abramowitz, was a religious functionary – a shochet, mashgiach and teacher.

Rabbi Abramowitz notes that his maternal grandfather, who arrived in Ottawa from Vilna in 1926 and moved to Toronto in 1929, authored three books and was the Toronto correspondent for New York Yiddish newspapers.

"He was one of the founders of the Agudath Hachozonim – Cantors Association of Ontario," said Rabbi Abramowitz.

The biographical information in Toronto's Sages dates back to Rabbi Isaac Halpern, who arrived in Toronto in 1889 and served as a spiritual leader and shochet. He died in 1922.

"These photographs of the Orthodox rabbinate and leaders and their biographies, some taken from their tombstones, provide the Jewish community with a monument to memorialize these great men," says Rabbi Abramowitz. "Some of them have international reputations."

Rabbi Abramowitz was educated in the Lubavitch school system in Worcester, Mass. He received his advanced rabbinical education from the Lubavitch yeshiva in Brooklyn, N.Y., and at the Rabbinical College of America in Morristown, N.J.

He is involved with rabbinical and cantorial activities and is a shochet who also works in kosher supervision.

Rabbi Abramowitz's previous publications include a pictorial history of the New England Orthodox rabbinate, Chachmei Yisrael of New England.

"In Toronto's Sages, I am focusing on Toronto since it is a place that played a major role in my family's history. This publication honours the memory of my grandfather and the rabbis of Toronto with whom he was associated," he said.

"Their righteousness should stand out forever."

Rabbi Abramowitz said that individuals have been left out of the book. "I would be glad to hear from people to include others in updated editions," he said.

He added that he encourages people in other areas "to create these pictorial and biographical books to perpetuate their scholars."

Quoting from the Talmud, Rabbi Abramowitz said, "The righteous, after their passing, are considered living."

For more information about Toronto's Sages, contact the Nathan Stolnitz Archives, Box 3635, Woodbridge, Ct. 06525, U.S.A., call 203-752-1998 or e-mail stolnitzarchives@webtv.net.

Greater Toronto Area

Counter-missionary conference set for students

The goal of an upcoming conference sponsored by Jews for Judaism, with a grant from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is to help parents, educators and youth workers understand the spiritual dangers students face from Christian missionary groups, organizers say.

The conference, titled "Empowering Our Students," will be held Dec. 11 from 9:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

Some 65 per cent of Jewish students in grades 7 to 12 have experienced some attempt to convert them to another religion, Jews for Judaism said in a statement promoting the conference.

In the Toronto area, the group said, missionary organizations such as Chosen People Ministries and Light of Messiah Ministries have special outreach efforts directed at Jewish teens.

As well, students doing research on the Internet frequently stumble onto missionary sites when exploring Jewish topics.

The conference will feature four workshops.

In the first, Adrienne Gold, a Jewish motivational speaker, will talk about fashion and body-image pressures that students bring to the classroom, and she'll discuss the barrage of media messages that children receive and how they're affected by them.

The second session will be led by Mike Kropveld, founding executive director of Info-Cult, a Montreal-based cult awareness organization that is the largest resource centre of its kind in Canada. The interactive session is titled, "Cults: Choice or Manipulation?"

Rabbi Craig Miller, the director of Jewish communal spiritual care for the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York, who converted to Christianity while a student at university, will present, "Winning the Battle for the Jewish Soul," which will discuss how missionaries work to influence Jews and why so many are vulnerable to their lure.

Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of education of Jews for Judaism, will present the final workshop on "Conveying the Spirituality of Judaism."

There is no charge for attending the conference, and lunch will be provided. Advanced registration is required. Contact Jews for Judaism at 905-761-0040.

Federal election gets underway

As pundits have noted, that has led to a lot of grumbling in Canada's Arab and Muslim populations.

"Twenty or 30 years ago, when it came to the Middle East, the scrutiny [of the government] came from the Jewish community," Weinfeld noted. "Now, it's increasingly coming from the Muslim and Arab communities. With each passing election, this tension is becoming more and more acute."

Pierre Pettigrew, Martin's foreign minister, was certainly under the magnifying glass when he paid a visit to the Middle East last February. Despite some flak for laying a wreath at the grave of the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, Pettigrew received passing grades among many Jewish observers.

The minister pledged Canadian expertise in a variety of areas, including border control and the judiciary, and said Canada has a "unique" role in the region.

But Martin has also received criticism from Jewish quarters. In September, he promised $24.5 million in additional Canadian assistance to the Palestinian Authority, bringing Ottawa's aid to Palestinians to $310 million since 1993. That was on top of the $12.2 million Martin pledged in aid to PA President Mahmoud Abbas, who visited Ottawa in May.

Even though Martin referred to Hamas as a terrorist group in his meeting with Abbas, and he warned there would be no democracy as long as extremist groups are armed, Ottawa has never confirmed that Abbas is doing what the aid is contingent on – namely, disarming Palestinian terrorists, and ending incitement in textbooks and the glorification of suicide bombers.

It was also on Martin's watch that Ottawa pledged to continue funding the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA), even after admissions that some of its employees were members of Hamas.

Still, Jewish communal officials concede that under Martin, Canada's voting record on UN resolutions pertaining to Israel has improved, but still has a long way to go.

Prior to last year's election, Martin told The CJN that he believed every UN resolution should be judged on its merit. He added that the Liberal government "has always defended the legitimacy of Israel, and I have stated publicly on many occasions that I do not believe there is any moral equivalence between defending one's country and terrorists who blow up innocent women and children."

In his CJN interview last year, Harper said his party has a long record of being "very supportive" of Israel.

"Like all Canadians, we want to [see], eventually, a democratic Palestine co-exist with a secure Israel. But the security of Israel, the survival of Israel, is non-negotiable, and we have been very critical of the government for what we see as their lax attitude towards international terrorism and the operation of terrorist organizations and their supporters in this country."

The NDP's Mideast position has changed little over the years. It envisions a two-state solution, the implementation of the post-1967 UN Resolution 242; the sharing of Jerusalem as a capital; and a just solution to the refugee issue.

In the coming weeks, The CJN will profile ridings with high concentrations of Jewish voters and Jewish candidates. Interview requests with all four national leaders have been made.

It's time for you and yours to visit Israel.

Jewish Life

The de Solas: a distinguished Sephardi lineage

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

ROOTS & REMEMBRANCE

When Abraham de Sola arrived in Montreal in 1846 to serve as spiritual leader of the city's Spanish and Portuguese Congregation, he carried a letter from his father, David de Sola, rabbi of London's Bevis Marks synagogue, beseeching the community to look after him because he was only 19 years old.

Abraham de Sola was probably Canada's first rabbi and was clearly destined for greatness. Word soon spread of his powers of oration and his lectures before various learned societies in Montreal typically drew overflow crowds. McGill University made him a professor of Hebrew and rabbinical literature and gave him an honorary degree, probably the first ever awarded to a Jew in an English-speaking country.

He gave pulpit lectures frequently in the United States and in 1872, by invitation of president Ulysses S. Grant, he opened the U.S. Congress with prayer. Because the event helped to warm relations between the two countries after a regrettable chill, the British prime minister, William Gladstone, sent him a personal note of thanks, knowing that despite his years in Quebec, the London-born rabbi was still a British subject.

Among his many accomplishments, Abraham de Sola influenced Canadian medical history through a series of articles in which he approved the use of pain-killing medication in childbirth. Quoting Hebrew sources, he asserted that administering an anesthesia was not contrary to scripture (Genesis 3:16) as some had contended, because it lessened the pain but not the toil or labour of parturition.

"In the history of Canadian Jewry, it is doubtful whether there could be found another religious leader who had the same impact as Abraham de Sola," writes Rabbi Wilfred Shuchat in The Gate of Heaven, his masterful history of Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

A shining beacon in Canada's 19th-century Jewish community, Abraham de Sola was descended from an illustrious Sephardi family that had been well known in Toledo and Navarre a full millennium earlier. The de Solas drew their name from an estate in northern Spain and were also eminent in Cordova, Seville, Tudela, Castile and Aragon. The persecutions of the 14th century forced them to Granada, and the expulsion of 1492 forced them to flee to Portugal, Holland, the Caribbean and other countries.

In Lisbon, David de Sola (Abraham's great-great-great grandfather) was tortured under the Inquisition and two of his sons were burnt at an auto-da-fé. Aaron de Sola (Abraham's great-great-grandfather) escaped from Portugal on a British ship and arrived in London in 1749, where "he and his family at once openly proclaimed their fidelity to Judaism," the Jewish Encyclopedia records.

Aaron relocated to Holland and a number of his sons established family dynasties and businesses in Amsterdam, Curacao and the United States. Son Benjamin served as court physician to William V of Orange, and son Isaac served as a general in Bolivar's army during the Venezuelan war of independence.

Abraham's father David de Sola, who fulfilled a historic role at Bevis Marks, married the daughter of British Chief Rabbi Meldola, scion of another distinguished Sephardi family from whom many illustrious physicians and rabbis were descended.

As if to further enhance the family name and legend, Abraham de Sola himself married a daughter of Henry Joseph of Berthier, nephew of Canadian Jewish pioneer Aaron Hart. His sons included Meldola de Sola, Canada's first native-born rabbi, who led the congregation after his father's demise; and Clarence de Sola, a Zionist pioneer, diplomat and contractor who constructed railway and highway bridges.

No doubt the subsequent generations of de Solas are continuing to do their ancestors proud.

Supporting Israel in times of less turmoil

By JOSH SCHEINERT

Guest Voice

The intifadah is over. Former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat is dead. The security barrier is saving lives. The Gaza disengagement went smoothly. Life in Israel is much less tense than it was just a short time ago.

Is this a sign that we can step back and breathe, for just a moment, in our moral offensive in support of Israel? The sense of urgency felt at the height of the intifadah seems to have diminished. We are more complacent having achieved the high ground; we are confident in our victory. But we are also starting to get tired of raising our voices for five years for a cause we knew to be right. Our energy is drained after advocating for a morality that large segments of the world cast aside. It might be time to lower our guard, just a bit.

Unfortunately, that mentality puts us in jeopardy. Now, more than ever, we need to recharge and re-engage. For I recently discovered, unless there is a sense of urgency pushing us to the forefront of Israel advocacy, we become increasingly vulnerable.

A friend and I went to the campus of American University in Washington, D.C., to hear a talk given by former Israel Defence Forces commando and current assistant district attorney in Jerusalem, Joey Ash. The topic was human rights considerations when fighting terrorism. Since Ash was a commander in the Jenin operation in April 2002, Jenin was a hot topic.

The few of us there who were supportive of Israel were uncomfortable. At the event, hosted by a Jewish group, we found ourselves significantly outnumbered. Wearing stickers of the Israeli flag, my friend and I decided to move to the front row, so that Ash would have something besides a kafiya in his view. The organizer of the event told me she had not expected such a hostile crowd. Perhaps that is why the only information on the Jenin operation was the information sheet, The Massacre at Jenin, a "massacre" that did not occur, being distributed outside the lecture hall.

The climax of the night came at the conclusion of Ash's speech, when a woman in the audience stood up and began reading an arrest warrant charging Ash with human rights abuses and war crimes under the Geneva Convention. When the "warrant" was ripped from her hands, another woman stood up and began reading from her copy. Eventually, one of the women was escorted out by campus security. During the reading of the "warrants," those not applauding were largely speechless, save a few.

The night ended with a barrage of accusations and untruthful statements being thrown at Ash during a deplorable question and answer session.

I left the event flooded with thoughts. To begin, I admired Ash for keeping his composure (in the elevator he told me that as a lawyer, he was used to situations in which he encountered hostility). But I was extremely embarrassed that he had been invited into a lion's den. Because of the perception that we had achieved secure high ground, we had let our guard down just a bit, when, in fact, we were the vulnerable ones. I left having learned that we cannot get too comfortable.

Now that there is less turmoil in Israel and we are starting to feel content with our achievements, our voices should continue to be raised in support of Israel, or else the only voices left will be those reading bogus arrest warrants. If the truth is not disseminated, people will only learn about the "massacre at Jenin." The old Zionist slogan, "If not now, then when?" still applies today.

Josh Scheinert is a graduate of McGill University and is working as a political science researcher in Washington, D.C.

Jewish Life

The price of depression

Books
Bernard Baskin

Despondency is a normal reaction to life. Who can live in our society without moments of despair and frustration? Every morning the headlines scream of scandal and chicanery. Television relentlessly drags crime, violence and inhumanity into our living rooms. Indeed, the person who does not, from time to time, experience feelings of pessimism must be considered abnormal.

In addition, our own life experiences often lead to disappointment. Our careers are thwarted, our expectations blunted. Sickness attacks our loved ones and ourselves. Pain and insecurity are unwelcome but inevitable callers. There is the tragedy of final parting and death. Is there any wonder that depression is a common experience?

How can we face up to our moods of despondency? In the first place, we should try to achieve a sense of proportion. Why do we select the dark and unhappy experiences of our lives and make them represent the whole of it. Life presents an uneven pattern of health and sickness, love and hate, success and failure. There are times when we reach the apex of the mountain and there are moments when we languish in the valley. We are born into all of it. There is no cure for life and death, save to enjoy the interval. If we are unwilling to accept life as it is, then we are in the wrong place.

A friend of mine who was showing some slides projected one picture that baffled him. He confessed: "I'm not sure whether this is a picture of a sunrise of a sunset." Unwittingly, he made a profound statement about many of life's experiences. So often we think we are going through a "sunset" and night is approaching. But we later discover that it wasn't a "sunset" after all. It was really a "sunrise" ushering in a new day.

In the second place, we must avoid the temptation of blaming others for our inadequacies and failures. This is not the road to equanimity. A man whose business is failing suddenly decides that his wife is the cause of the downfall. The businessman discovers a scapegoat in the labour unions. The annoyed citizen finds temporary delight in flaying the bureaucrats. This kind of gratification is understandable, but short-lived.

Blaming oneself as an escape route from despondency is equally harmful and unsuccessful.

Blaming ourselves or others is an unworkable escape mechanism. It nurtures the dark side of our nature and blinds us to the possibilities of affirmative and fruitful action. Normal people are not merely thermometers that register emotional climate. They are more like thermostats that try to control the temperature of life.

To be sure, our biological inheritance, our childhood experiences and our environmental conditioning do exercise a vital influence upon. But we are not only shaped by our environment; we shape it.

Our environment determines the language we speak, but whether our words are cruel or gentle, carping or comforting depends squarely upon us. Our passions, appetites and instincts are part of our animal equipment, but whether they rule us or we rule them is left for each of us to determine.

In the third place – although there is no way to deny the tragic sense of life – depression can be lessened if we realize that most situations are not as desperate as they seem. It is not simply a matter of picking ourselves up by our own willpower and moving ahead. It is rather a matter of insight into a dark situation and becoming aware of possibilities.

Life is full of coercions. Indeed, life itself is coercion. And the young never tire of reminding their parents: "I didn't ask to be born." One of Sholom Aleichem's characters makes the wry observation: "The way life is, you're better off not to be born. But who can be so lucky? Maybe one in ten thousand." Life is indeed a matter of coercion, but we must accept it gladly and use it wisely. How can anyone nurture feelings or defeat pessimism in the face of the mammoth tasks that lie before us? We cannot prevent the birds of depression from flying over our heads, but we can prevent them from building a nest in our hair.

Jews on the tube, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Is TV good for the Jews?

I'm not talking about how much TV you should – or shouldn't – be watching. Or about job creation in the TV industry. Rather, has TV been good for the depiction of Jews?

Several books have dealt with the phenomenon. In Over the Top Judaism, Chicago's Rabbi Elliott Gertel says sometimes Hollywood acts as if it's doing Jews a favour by including them in a TV show. But without realizing, Hollywood may be doing more harm than good. Rabbi Gertel cites an example of a (thankfully) short-lived TV series, Skin, that depicted an ethical Jewish pornographer. On the other hand, Rabbi Gertel says that sometimes TV can get it right. He mentions an episode of Little House on the Prairie in which a little boy meets an elderly Jewish craftsman. [http://tinyurl.com/e4bfe]

I was most interested by Gertel's survey of how the depiction of Jewish characters has changed over the years. In the 1950s, '60s and '70s, Jewish characters who typically appeared on Bonanza or Magnum PI were looking for some help to get out of a difficult situation. In the '70s, "the themes were primarily the Holocaust, with survivors battling Nazis who were lurking about," as well as plots dealing with mixed marriages. Then in the '80s and '90s, you had a period of Jewish self-mockery or Jewish angst in programs like thirtysomething and Seinfeld.

Ah, Seinfeld. That show has probably generated some of the strongest debate over the Jewishness of a TV show. Some critics called it "self-hating." Others welcomed a show that portrayed Jews as typical Americans. "The Jews have arrived," said Rabbi Harold Schulweis. "We no longer are asking, 'What will the anti-Semites say?'" [http://tinyurl.com/c6ks3] You can read through entire Seinfeld scripts with Jewish themes and decide for yourself. [http://tinyurl.com/ 7jukp] And then find out what the Jewish characters in Seinfeld and South Park say about Jewish life in America today. [http://tinyurl.com/czm8u]

In 1990, the American Jewish Committee, along with the Norman Lear Center of the University of Southern California, produced a 150-page report titled Jews in Prime Time. [http://tinyurl.com/cg33o] (The Lear Center [http://tinyurl.com/7dxf2] says you can receive a free copy if you e-mail your name and address to enter@usc. edu.) The report concludes that although the treatment of religion in general was "woefully represented" in prime time, the "vast increase in the numerical representation of Jews on the TV screen in the last decades must be acknowledged as a unique and hopefully positive force."

Judith and Rabbi Jonathan Pearl agree. The Pearls are authors of the book, The Chosen Image, and founded the Jewish Televimages Resource Center to monitor Jewish themes and portrayals on TV. The Pearls argue that Jewish characters actually do retain their Jewish identity on television. Critic Michael Medved acknowledges the benefits of a growing Jewish presence on TV. But he says that presence is invariably of an assimilated Jew who is intermarried. He says it's as if TV Jews have an 11th commandment handed down on Mt. Hollywood that says, "Thou shall not be attracted to someone of a Jewish background." [http://tinyurl.com/8kkxa]

I don't think Medved or the Pearls would be fans of "Chrismukkah," a mishmash of a holiday made famous by a character on The OC who has a Jewish father and Christian mother. You can listen to an interview with Josh Schwartz, the program's creator and executive producer, and find out why he's been popularizing this fabricated celebration on network TV. [http://tinyurl. com/cpmoz]

With all that Jewish (and pseudo-Jewish) content out there, is there an audience for a Jewish TV network? John Odoner thinks so. Odoner is founder of JTV, a proposed American cable network that hopes to serve 6.7 million Americans, as well as "13.3 million who are a quarter or half Jewish." Critics are skeptical and say that many people have tried – and failed – to create a Jewish network. [http://tinyurl.com/dq8k2] Regardless, Odoner says "the time is right." [http://jtelevision.com/]

JWI collects household items for women's shelter

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

All it took was one call from the North York Women's Shelter, and in just one week, Jewish Women International/Canada collected a roomful of much-needed household items and clothing for women in crisis.

Elisha Wagman, JWI/C's director of development, said that on Nov. 22, a representative from the 20-year-old, multicultural shelter contacted her and asked for some assistance.

"They had a large number of women who were either planning to move out before the holiday season or had just moved out, and they needed items to set up their homes," Wagman said.

"These women had fled their homes often with nothing but what they were wearing, and they needed the basic necessities."

In the past, she said, the shelter had done some ad hoc fundraising, and a sponsor had provided women with moving-out kits, "but the sponsor has shifted its focus elsewhere."

Wagman knew the shelter's request was of top priority, she said, so she and some JWI colleagues decided to send out an urgent request for donations to everyone they knew.

"The request came, and we didn't hesitate. Our goal was to reach 1,000 people, and seven days later we had reached three-quarters of our goal."

They asked for new kitchen equipment, she said, because of the dietary laws of some of the women, but they also requested gently used clothing for women and children.

"It was like magic. People from all walks of life, in the Jewish community and beyond, answered our request. The shelter now has a roomful of merchandise ready to distribute," Wagman said.

"None of us expected this response. It taught us that we're not alone in our battle to end violence against women. The power of people is unbelievable."

She said JWI has to work hard to raise funds for its own programs, so "to decide that another organization needs [our] help speaks to the core of this organization. We paused and said that what [the shelter] needed was vital."

Staff at the North York Women's Shelter are overwhelmed by results of JWI/C campaign.

Jacqueline Lett, house co-ordinator for the shelter, called the campaign a "lifesaver. Without [it] we would not have the resources to fill the wishes of the women in the shelter. The outreach from the community has been wonderful."

Those who wish to donate merchandise can call 416-635-9425, ext. 517, and leave a message.

Shaarei Shomayim's cantor is focusing on youth

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Avichai Zehavi has moved from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus – where he taught Tanach and rabbinics and served as director of student programs and activities – to become the cantor at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, but he is still involved in working with young people.

"I feel I need to work with the teens and the children, because this is the future of the shul," he said in an interview last week at his home.

Among his outreach efforts to synagogue youth since he took on the new position in August, Zehavi taught holiday songs before Rosh Hashanah, arranged for teen tables – to provide ruach [spirit] – at a recent Carlebach night/Shabbat dinner, and now has young children participating in part of the weekly Shabbat services. He hopes that, as young as they are, they will feel that they are a part of the synagogue.

In addition to other clerical responsibilities, he also runs the synagogue's bar mitzvah program (his wife, Idit, runs the bat mitzvah program), and once a month, he can be found at the congregation's new teen minyan.

Avichai Zehavi

Although Zehavi, 37, has been singing all his life, he said that unlike his predecessor Cantor Yaakov Motzen – with whom, coincidentally, he performed as a child choir soloist when Motzen was starting his career – he is "not cantorial.

"I'm about tfillah [prayer]," said Zehavi, a tenor who is also a member of Toronto's Kol Chaverim choir.

His love of music goes back to his childhood, growing up in a religious Zionist family in Israel. Although there were no professional cantors or musicians in his family, they all loved to sing and had good voices, he said. He and his brother had a band, and his brother is still involved with it. When Zehavi was growing up, he said, the whole neighbourhood could hear his family singing around the table on Shabbat.

The parents of four children ranging in age from four months to 12 years old, the Zehavis came to Toronto in 2000 as shlichim. Although Avichai was initially reluctant – it was his wife who initiated the idea – he says it was the best move they could have made, opening their minds to the differences and needs of Jews outside of Israel.

One difference he noted was that here, synagogues offer "a community. In Israel, you mostly come [to synagogue] just to daven."

Apparently, the move also improved his English. According to Zehavi, he had only a working knowledge when he arrived here. In his first year of teaching, he was unexpectedly given a "new stream" class of students who did not have a day school background. "I made a deal with my students. They were lacking Hebrew and I was lacking English. The deal was, I would teach them Hebrew and they would teach me English. At every class, I was taught four to six new words."

An experienced teacher who, before leaving Israel was principal of a dormitory school and also taught pedagogy to teachers in training, Zehavi received a Teacher of Excellence award here in 2002. The privately sponsored award recognizes teachers within the Jewish day school system.

Perhaps not coincidentally, both his parents were teachers before they retired. His mother, the daughter of Holocaust survivors, taught elementary school, and his father, a Yemenite Jew who made aliyah as a seven-year-old orphan as part of Israel's Operation Magic Carpet, taught high school.

In Toronto, the Zehavis opened their home to students after hours, inviting up to half a dozen at a time for Shabbat meals. "We felt that this is what we [wanted to] give to the community," he said. The students experienced a traditional Shabbat environment, but there was also a lot of "chilling and schmoozing… and talking about life."

ZAREINU FASHIONISTAS: Event co-chairs, from left, Robin Shugar-Hershkop, Renee Rosenzweig, Stacy Markin and Esti Cohen organized a New York-style fashion show on Nov. 21 to benefit Zareinu Educational Centre, a day school and treatment centre for children with special needs. The show, which attracted a sold-out crowd of 700 to Le Parc, featured Canadian designer Franco Mirabelli.

DRUM BUDDIES: United Synagogue Day School student Lendon Gertner and Frances Ittleman enjoyed participating in an intergenerational drumming and percussion event at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living on Nov. 23. More than 80 people, including United Way volunteers from Procter and Gamble, took part in the "Days of Caring" event, whose goal was to promote understanding between seniors and students and dismiss stereotypes.

Shabbat lectures planned at Cipin seniors' residence

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While Shabbat is meant to be a sacred time for prayer, rest and reflection, when you're a senior and living alone, that time may have a tendency to pass too slowly.

Sylvia Walt found herself grappling with that problem and decided to do something about it.

Always thirsting for knowledge, the grandmother of eight organized weekly Shabbat lectures for residents in her building, the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community in North York.

Walt, with the assistance of her caregiver, Espy Santiago, arranges for speakers to share their insights at the building on Saturday afternoons. Walt comes up with ideas for the lectures or polls fellow residents about topics that would interest the Kumzietz (come sit) Group.

Some residents help print and post flyers to advertise the program and others bring refreshments such as beverages, biscuits and fresh fruit.

So far, Walt has brought experts on such wide-ranging issues as matchmaking, nutrition and the Maccabiah Games to the Reuben Cipin building.

"I've enjoyed all the lectures… [because] I like to be entertained and I always am," says Marion Fine.

Others who have attended the lectures agree.

"We learn a lot – everybody does," says Leah Frimerman.

"The lecture on Maccabiah – that was something."

The weekly program has become so popular that they had to move out of the building's card room into a larger area to accommodate the 40-plus participants, more than one-quarter of the building's population.

"If you can find interesting speakers that will feed you with things you don't know, or want to know, then you'll come," says Sharyn Cipin.

And just like their grand or even great-grandchildren, the group's members illustrate that the student in all of us lives on as we age.

"Having attended many lectures, I've seen that a lot of questions are asked, but sometimes people are so eager to ask questions that they don't wait till the lecture has finished," says Reuben Cipin.

Affiliated with Baycrest, the Cipin facility was established to provide seniors with independent-living condominiums.

In addition to the Kumzietz Group, residents volunteer their time in numerous programs, such as gardening, exercise and dance classes, movie screenings, drama and Jewish history.

The various activities have helped foster a communal-like atmosphere.

"This is a place where everyone came not knowing anyone else and now they're like family," says Sharyn Cipin.

Anna Newman agrees. "We are lonely, but not alone," she says. "There are always people around to talk to."

As for her next project, Walt, the past president of the Canadian Magen David Adom, Toronto chapter, says she'd like to start a support group to help people who have lost loved ones. She wants to call it Nechamah, the Hebrew word for comfort.

Jews and Palestinians back Mideast initiative

Canadian groups welcome federal government plan

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

They may not agree on much, but representatives of the Jewish and Palestinian communities in Canada are applauding a recent government initiative aimed at developing democracy in the Palestinian territories.

Early last week, Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew announced plans for the Canada Centre for Peace and Democracy in the Middle East. He called it "a platform for increased Canadian activity with the parties in the area… [whose] goal is to contribute to the foundation of a viable Palestinian state, with a dynamic society and vibrant economy. We want to improve living standards and help create a Palestinian state that includes democracy, the rule of law, strong public administration and good governance."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel, said the initiative could help give Palestinians a stake in the development of democracy while also encouraging Arabs in the region to adopt Canada's and Israel's shared democratic values.

Meanwhile, Palestine House, an educational, social and cultural centre, issued a news release saying it is "pleased with the recent initiative" and "encouraged" by its goals.

Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of CIC, said "Canada has the same set of values as Israel and when it communicates and encourages adoption of those values by the people in the region, including the Palestinians, everybody is better for it.

"As Palestinians become more aware of the benefits of true democracy and see themselves as stakeholders in not only obtaining it but sustaining it, that will have a positive effect on its relations with Israel as well," he said.

Samir Jabbour, chair of Palestine House's media and communications committee, said creation of the facility represents "a significant step toward ending bloodshed, violence from all sides, the oppressive occupation and resolving the long, painful struggle for peace and reconciliation not only between Israelis and Palestinians, but also throughout the Middle East."

He also said he expected Canada would be faithful "to its international commitments, which imply the implementation of all UN resolutions requiring Israel to end its colonial occupation of all the occupied Arab territories, including east Jerusalem.

"Needless to say, ending the occupation and all its manifestations and consequences is a prerequisite for Canada's initiative to yield fruitful results," he added.

In announcing the peace and democracy centre, Pettigrew acknowledged the allocation of more than $36 million in 2005 "as part of its enhanced program of assistance for the Palestinians.

"As the volume of our assistance grows, we need to supplement our diplomatic presence with a broad-based facility that can support our activities in Gaza, the West Bank and throughout the Middle East. The Canada Centre for Peace and Democracy is intended to serve as a concrete symbol of Canada's dedication to supporting Palestinians in their nation building. We have a long-term commitment to building sustainable peace in the region," the minister said.

"We intend to use the Canada Centre to introduce innovative technologies and solutions to facilitate governance, democratic dialogue and capacity-building enhancement. And, through the use of both online and traditional approaches, we hope to facilitate opportunities for Palestinians and citizens of neighbouring countries to engage in joint training initiatives."

Fogel said he first floated the idea for a peace and democracy centre about six months ago to Jim Anderson, Pettigrew's director of policy. It was based on a suggestion by Irwin Cotler, then a backbench member of Parliament, to Lloyd Axworthy, who at the time served as minister of foreign affairs. Though the idea at the time went nowhere, Fogel said if implemented now, it would give Canada a visible presence on the ground and provide positive results.

Not only will a peace and democracy centre pay dividends in the region, Fogel suggested, it could lead "to greater collaboration between Jews and Palestinians in Canada."

One way could be through creation of a foundation "that would help deliver some of the programming at the centre" and "dissipate tensions here."

PhD candidate shares her passion for science

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

WINDSOR, Ont. — When other children were playing with toys, Sharonna Greenberg, now 25, was experimenting with acids, bases and indicators with her mother and solving math problems with her father.

Currently working on her PhD in chemistry at the University of Windsor, Greenberg – she is a graduate of Earl Haig Secondary School and the University of Toronto – is one of two recipients of L'Oreal Canada Mentor Fellowship for 2005-06.

The fellowships, in the amount of $20,000, are aimed at supporting women scientists in Canada.

For the past three years, they have been awarded to young female scientists at the doctoral level in order to encourage them to continue their studies and become a source of inspiration for young Canadian girls.

Sharonna Greenberg

Beginning in the near year, Greenberg and the other winner, Andrea Ottensmeyer, will participate in mentoring sessions organized by Actua, a charitable organization whose mission is to provide young Canadians with positive, practical learning experiences in science, technology and engineering.

The two will visit universities across Canada, and share their experiences and passion for science with girls aged eight to 17 at summer camps, workshops and clubs, and by means of a website, www.girls.actua.ca.

Greenberg, whose mother is a chemistry teacher and whose father studied engineering, says she grew up with good role models. "I always had lots of friends who were interested in science and math, but I know that girls are under-represented in the field.

"Things are slowly changing, however. More and more women are entering the field. There are a few women science professors at University of Windsor, and they just hired their first female chemistry professor."

Current statistics cited by L'Oreal say women comprise only nine per cent of professional engineers in Canada and hold nine per cent of full-time teaching positions in engineering and applied sciences and 12.9 per cent in physical sciences and mathematics, compared with 24.6 per cent in agricultural and biological sciences.

In an attempt to share her knowledge with others, Greenberg says she worked as a teaching assistant in the mathematics department at University of Toronto when she was studying there and as a lab demonstrator and teaching assistant in the chemistry department of the University of Windsor.

She has also helped coach a math contest for high school students, has prepared and executed interactive presentations and experiments of several scientific topics for elementary and high school students, and is a volunteer with Big Brothers Big Sisters of Canada.

She has received a Julie Payette Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council (NSERC) award for her first year of graduate studies, an NSERC Canada Graduate Scholarship for her future years of graduate studies, and is the recipient of the Governor General of Canada's Silver Academic Medal, which honours the academic achievements of an individual at the undergraduate level.

In her current research, she is interested in the development of novel routes toward carbon-hydrogen bond activation, which could have potential applications in the recycling of plastics and in the petroleum industry.

With about three years of graduate school ahead of her, Greenberg says she is headed for a position either in the petroleum industry or in academia.

U.K. journalist plays fast and loose with truth

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Robert Fisk, the longstanding Middle East correspondent for the U.K. newspaper The Independent, was in Canada recently to promote his mammoth new book, The Great War for Civilization: The Conquest of the Middle East. Based in Lebanon, Fisk is notorious for his one-sided reporting of Middle East affairs, laying the blame for the region's ills mainly on the United States and Israel.

Fisk is sometimes published in Canadian newspapers and has appeared on the CBC. He is much admired in left-wing media circles for his anti-American and anti-Israel slant.

Fisk will occasionally criticize Arab dictators. For example, in a November 2002 talk at Montreal's Concordia University, Fisk called former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein a "wicked, cruel tyrant," and former Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat a "corrupt, vain little despot."

Other journalists who have been truly critical of Arab leaders have been harassed, threatened and prevented from reporting from Arab countries. But in the final analysis, Fisk's critiques of Arab regimes have never put him at real risk or prevented him from getting a story. It is well accepted that his real target is the United States, whom he blames for supporting Arab dictatorships.

Reporting from Iraq in the late 1990s, Fisk blamed the U.S.-led United Nations sanctions for taking a heavy toll on civilians. He often pointed out that children, especially, were being deprived of food and medicine. Rarely did he blame Saddam for his cruel tyranny that repressed and terrorized many Iraqis. Nor did he investigate Saddam's siphoning of UN funds to build luxurious palaces.

In a Nov. 26 Globe and Mail article, "I am not a Muslim. I am a journalist," Marcus Gee wrote about a lecture Fisk gave at the University of Toronto: "Praise for his rants against American arrogance and brutality echoes around the Internet, where he is a hero to Bush bashers. He lectures to adoring university students around North America and the world. At the University of Toronto... a packed hall hung on his words."

Gee quotes Fisk as saying: "I am a journalist. And the job of a journalist is to tell the truth." However, Fisk often distorts the truth, especially where Israel is concerned.

CBC viewers got a taste of this a few years ago, when Fisk participated in a panel discussion on the now-defunct Newsworld show Counterspin. It followed a broadcast of the BBC documentary The Accused, a one-sided account of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's involvement in the 1982 Sabra and Shatilla massacre in Lebanon.

Fisk read a passage from the Kahan Commission report on the massacre, in which Sharon is described as bearing "personal responsibility" for what happened. Fisk made it appear that the commission blamed Sharon directly for the catastrophe.

Fisk is rarely challenged on the facts, but co-panelist Norman Spector, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel, nailed him, pointing out that Fisk had quoted a single phrase out of context. Spector said Fisk ignored a crucial section of the report that clearly stated Sharon was "indirectly" responsible for events because he failed to anticipate that Christian Phalangists might attack Palestinians in the camps.

Having been corrected by Spector, Fisk immediately agreed: "Yes, we all accept that." Yet in subsequent talks and articles, Fisk went right back to insisting that the Kahan Commission found Sharon "personally responsible" for the massacre. His decision to distort the truth in order to push an agenda is irrefutably established in this case – just one of many.

Fisk has been a journalist for at least 30 years. In the preface of his book, he writes that he had always thought a journalist's role was to be "the first impartial witness to history." Then, merely two years ago, Amira Hass, a Ha'aretz reporter on Palestinian affairs, convinced Fisk, in what he portrays as a major epiphany for him, that reporters need "to monitor centres of power."

This account rings utterly false. Furthermore, many critics argue that Fisk has all along been an outright advocate. Yet he would have readers believe that for the first 28 years of his career he saw himself as a purely "impartial" witness.

In his case, distortion runs very deep indeed.

Jewish poverty tied to assimilation, conference told

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Poverty can be even more degrading for Jews than it is for non-Jews, delegates to the inaugural conference of the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies, Canada branch (AJFCA-Canada), heard last week.

In addition to going without basic human necessities, Jews who lack financial means may be denied access to goods and services that keep them connected to Judaism, Mark Zarecki, executive director of Jewish Family Services of Ottawa, told the gathering, titled "Recognizing Jewish Poverty in Canada: a Call to Action."

For that reason, poverty can lead to assimilation, Zarecki said.

"Jewish poverty and assimilation are highly correlated. That means that if someone is poor and cannot afford the basic necessities, they cannot afford to have a Jewish life," he said.

"When you address Jewish poverty, you are also addressing the identity of Jews."

He said Jews who are struggling financially find themselves in a double bind, being "poor among the Jews and Jewish among the poor, so they have no support group."

The conference, held Nov. 27 to 29 at Ottawa's Agudath Israel Synagogue, brought together nearly 80 representatives from Jewish family service agencies and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) from Vancouver to Halifax to discuss the issue of poverty in the Jewish community – what it means and how to deal with it.

The gathering allowed participants to meet, share ideas and learn from one another, organizers said.

Workshops covered issues such as domestic abuse and mental health, as well as the needs of children, seniors and newcomers to Canada.

Former NDP leader Ed Broadbent's address to delegates marked his last official task as a member of Parliament (he's not running for re-election in Ottawa Centre).

"I am delighted that you are having a conference on poverty within the Jewish community. It is terrific that you should be raising the issue of poverty within your own community," said Broadbent, who noted the stereotype that all Jews are wealthy is obviously not true.

He cited child poverty statistics for Canada and other countries.

"We are 19th out of 26 industrialized countries when it comes to child poverty – not something we should be proud of," he said. "In the final analysis, child poverty is about degradation. It is about not allowing human beings to be what they can be."

Keynote speaker David Bornstein, author of Social Entrepreneurship: Stories of Innovation, discussed new ways people around the world have found to solve social problems, suggesting that some of the models could be used in Canada and in the Jewish community.

"Our program was very ambitious and I think it delivered a lot of things for people to think about," said conference chair Allan Moscovitch, a professor of social work at Carleton University and chair of ADFCA-Canada.

"Our purpose was to cover a range of issues and to include not only some speakers and educational materials, but it was also an opportunity for organizations to share the kinds of experiences they have had."

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, gave a workshop on "The ABC'S of Effective Lobbying."

Following the conference, a committee will be struck to evaluate and make recommendations for future planning, he said.

"There is lots of scope for collaboration," said Moscovitch. "We accomplished our objective in being able to share experiences, to inform ourselves and our members on issues related to Jewish poverty, and hopefully it will be a springboard for working together on national public awareness campaigns that are of importance to us and to working together on informing the Jewish community around issues of concern."

Census analysis paints gloomy picture

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Almost half of Ottawa's Jewish children under 15 are living in households led by intermarried couples, according to an analysis of the 2001 census.

This and other disturbing trends were revealed at the first official meeting of the newly formed Jewish Federation of Ottawa.

The meeting was open to members of the community, a number of whom came to hear the results of the census analysis and how federation plans to respond to its findings.

The analysis was presented by Allan Moscovitch, a professor of social work at Carleton University and chair of the federation's planning and allocations committee.

He noted that although approximately one-third of Ottawa's Jews live in intermarried households, the numbers are higher among young adults.

According to the census, 82 per cent of married Jews under age 30 have a non-Jewish spouse, but fewer than 40 per cent of Jews over 40 are intermarried.

With 13,445 Jews, according to the 2001 census, Ottawa has the fifth-largest Jewish community in Canada, but its population is aging.

The study defined a Jew as anyone who self-identifies as Jewish either religiously or ethnically and does not identify with any other religion, Moscovitch said.

The federation's strategic objectives were enumerated by chair Ron Prehogan.

"We are planning a professionally facilitated retreat which will bring experts to a town hall meeting… to study the Ottawa Jewish community in a very targeted way, by speaking to people in our community, to hold focus groups and to present the results at the meeting," he said.

Federation president Mitchell Bellman said the Boston-based Jewish Outreach Institute (JOI) has been hired to do a study of the community.

"This is a response to the low levels of affiliation in our community and our desire to do outreach," he said.

In addition to seeking advice from the JOI, the federation will consider various initiatives over the next 18 months to address concerns raised by the census study, Bellman said.

The challenge of maintaining a strong Jewish community rests with the younger generation, making it imperative that the community find a way to engage young adults, he said.

Moscovitch said that while Jewish education is seen to be a very important way to keep people affiliated, enrolment in Jewish schools is dropping.

He said the reasons for this include high cost, especially for families with more than one child, as well as the quality of the education and children's lack of interest.

Elections put Mideast justice summit on hold

By PAUL SHINDMAN
CJN Israel Bureau

The summit of Middle East justice ministers that had been tentatively scheduled to take place in Ottawa early next year has been put on hold by coincidental elections and political changes in all the participating countries.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler said the fall of the Liberal government began the last in a string of ongoing election campaigns in Israel, Egypt and the Palestinian Authority, and it also coincided with a wholesale cabinet shuffle in Jordan.

"It's rather amazing. We're not talking about one [country] not being unable or uncertain, we're talking about all five, including the host country," Cotler told The CJN in a telephone interview from his office in Ottawa.

The four justice ministers from the Middle East had been slated to meet in Ottawa to discuss legal and human rights issues in the first summit of its kind, dubbed "ME4."

Cotler said his four counterparts all said they remain committed to ME4, but the present political situation made the timing unfavourable.

"None of them can say for sure that they will be the minister of justice" when the summit is finally held, possibly next summer, Cotler said.

While in the Middle East this past summer as a senior ping-pong player on Canada's Maccabiah Games squad, the Mount Royal MP visited neighbouring Arab ministers to extend the invitation to Ottawa. The justice ministers of Israel, Jordan, Egypt and the Palestinian Authority all agreed to attend the first-ever justice dialogue involving the four countries.

Cotler invoked former prime minister Pierre Trudeau's slogan "a just society" several times when describing his own vision for the Middle East. He said the concept preceded Trudeau and can be found in both Jewish and Islamic law.

Cotler said he tells Jewish and Muslim leaders that "if you go back to your own legal conceptions you will find a lot of commonality in your respective justice systems."

The summit was originally timed to occur after elections in the PA and Egypt, but Palestinian elections were delayed to January, while Israelis are now going to the polls in March. As well, King Abdullah of Jordan just reshuffled his cabinet, and Egyptian elections may only finish Dec. 8.

Over the summer, the ministers agreed on a draft discussion agenda based on five principles: promotion of democracy, human rights, good governance and the rule of law; the relationship between security and rights; protection of vulnerable minorities; combating of hatred, discrimination and all forms of intolerance; and building an international justice system for the 21st century.

"We [Canadians] come to this [summit] with a view of where we can be of assistance," Cotler said.

"We don't come to impose views or outcomes, we come to share, and [we] are undertaking capacity-building and rule-of-law approaches at the invitation of the Palestinian Authority."

Canadian police have been in Jordan training Iraqi police, Cotler said, and Canada has offered the Palestinians Canadian law enforcement expertise in cross-border security and in developing their justice system.

Cotler said he believes that getting the four justice ministers to sit down "in a shared dialogue on common fundamental principles will be a form of diplomatic engagement that will make a unique Canadian contribution to the peace process."

Cotler believes the ME4 summit will take place even if the Liberals lose the upcoming election. He said justice critics from the NDP, Bloc Quebecois and Conservatives have all expressed support for the initiative and have been invited to attend.

"It's a government of Canada event and not something that reflected a particular political party. I believe that this initiative will come to pass, regardless of who is the government," he said.

Jews flock to Montreal

The Montreal office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) says it has received more than 600 immigrants since the beginning of 2005.

They have come from Latin America, France, Israel and the former Soviet Union, among other countries.

The agency had a total caseload of 2,583 as of Sept. 30, which includes immigrants who have arrived in the past two years and more than 1,000 who are in the immigration process, most of whom are still abroad or here on student or other visas. All have expressed a wish to live in Quebec.

The largest number are from the former Soviet Union, 718; France, 529; Argentina, 456; Israel, 348; and North Africa, 238. This caseload includes almost 540 children.

FEDERATION CJA estimates that at least 80 per cent of Jews settling in Quebec use JIAS's counselling services or practical assistance.

Over the past few years, the federation has been encouraging immigration as a way of reinvigorating the Montreal Jewish community, which has been losing members and aging.

'There's much more that needs to be done' abstention to opposition. Laurin explained that the measure "unfairly placed the onus of responsibility for renewed negotiations on Israel only, while the reality is that confidence-building measures and goodwill gestures are needed from both sides.

"We believe this language is unbalanced and unhelpful to overall goals of the peace process."

Canada also praised the Palestinian observer to the UN for withdrawing a resolution on Palestinian children. Laurin said it was a step toward reducing "what we have long regarded as the excessive number of Middle East resolutions."

As of last week, Canada's votes on three other resolutions did not mark a departure from previous years. In two of those, Canada sided with the majority, including the measure on the status of Jerusalem.

Canada's position is that Jerusalem "remains an issue for negotiation by the two sides," and that Israel "should desist from measures which pre-empt such negotiations and risk complicating a peaceful resolution."

Those include the expansion of settlements within and around Jerusalem, Laurin said.

Marc Gold, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, said Canada's change in votes is a "step in the right direction" and "long overdue. In that respect, we're happy to see the government continue as it began last year to address real problems at the UN."

But, Gold stressed, "there's much more that needs to be done in order to address structural and systemic problems" at the world body.

Community leaders are recalling Prime Minister Paul Martin's Nov. 13 speech to the United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto, where he pledged to "continue to press for the kinds of reforms that will eliminate the politicization of the United Nations and its agencies, and in particular, the annual ritual of politicized anti-Israel resolutions."

B'nai Brith Canada called on the government to honour that pledge "by consistently rejecting each and every resolution that does nothing to advance the cause of Middle East peace, that holds Israel solely accountable for the conflict, and that effectively turns a blind eye to ongoing Palestinian terrorism."

The three changed resolutions represent a fraction of the annual package of anti-Israel measures, B'nai Brith noted, adding that Ottawa should adopt a "zero-tolerance" policy on Israel-bashing at the UN.

In his remarks to the 191-member states, Laurin said Canada has "strongly" encouraged more constructive resolutions.

Canada has also criticized "inflammatory, provocative and divisive language in resolutions; language that creates a sense of imbalance, and seems to suggest that it is only Israel that has obligations."

Israel's security needs and Palestinian responsibilities are often under-emphasized, Laurin continued.

Canada, he said, "will not support resolutions that use emotive and provocative language in place of the straight facts."

He said Canada is working toward fewer, more focused, and more balanced resolutions, and he issued a blanket condemnation of terrorism.

"It is a widely accepted view that non-combatants should not be targeted, by any means, by any party to a conflict. We therefore firmly and unequivocally condemn any form of support, either direct or indirect, to terrorist organizations.

"The use of suicide bombing against innocent civilians is particularly abhorrent. No legitimate, democratic state can ever be built through the use of terrorism. Terrorists and their supporters should immediately be brought to justice and networks disarmed and dismantled."

But neither did Canada let Israel off the hook completely.

Laurin said the Jewish state "must strive to build trust by refraining from unilateral actions that may prejudge the outcome of final status negotiations."

Those actions include ensuring that the route of Israel's security barrier does not stray from the 1967 border, "nor disrupts the livelihoods of Palestinian farmers," he said.

While Israel's withdrawal from Gaza was "a courageous step," further efforts to draw borders "should be achieved through negotiation. It is not a small point: When negotiations succeed, even in modest steps, they provide the strongest ammunition against violence."

In the past year, Israel has seen several positive moves at the UN, ranging from the decision to dedicate an annual Holocaust memorial day to the first ever Security Council condemnation of Hezbollah following a round of attacks on the Lebanon-Israel border.

"We view these changes favourably. We're thankful the Canadian government has rethought some of its attitudes," Isreli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev told the Jerusalem Post. He added that at the UN in general, countries have been "more attentive" to Israel's concerns than before.

"The atmosphere in the UN has changed significantly," Israeli ambassador Dan Gillerman told the Post last week. "Israel is no longer an isolated country, but rather a normal and accepted member of the UN."

Jews protest N.S. town's Christmas proclamation

BY JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A motion passed unanimously last week by the Nova Scotia town of Oxford proclaiming December to be the "Christmas season" is "ridiculous," says the executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"I'm somewhat taken aback that the town councillors felt they had to legislate in this manner," Jon Goldberg of Halifax was quoted as saying last week after Oxford's town council also decreed that no name other than Christmas would be used for the holiday season, because "the holiday originated from the birth of Jesus Christ."

"As I've said a number of times, we have no objections to the celebration of Christmas," Goldberg said. "I'm shocked that they felt, as Christians, that they had to use the power of legislation to celebrate such a wonderful holiday.

Goldberg said the Jewish community – which numbers about 2,000 people among Nova Scotia's population of one million – recognizes that the majority of people in the province are Christian. But he stressed the passing of such a motion in a community "just because there is no apparent minority goes against the concept of multiculturalism that we have worked so hard for in this province."

He said multiculturalism is not reflected in this region as it is in Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal, where "there is a plethora of cultures and races, and, in many cases, probably more non-Christians in some schools than Christians. Old-time Christmas concerts, as I knew growing up, no longer exist when teachers see more multicultural faces."

But in Atlantic Canada, he said, which is more white and more Christian than Canada's three largest cities, there has been a strong reaction against this.

Oxford town deputy mayor Leonard Allen, who introduced the motion to establish the decree, told the Halifax Chronicle Herald that it was not intended to offend other religions but to declare that as a Canadian, he and his community have a right to recognize and celebrate Christmas for what it is.

He also told the paper that he hoped schools would call their holiday concerts "Christmas concerts" and that other communities would follow Oxford's example.

Goldberg said he hopes no one takes up those suggestions.

"In public school, I'm hoping non-Christians will not be forced to take part against their will in Christmas concerts, and I'm hoping school boards, principals and teachers will not make [non-Christian children] stand out amongst their peers.

"I'm also hoping this type of activity does not spread across the province."

Oxford's proclamation "indicates to me some insecurities in the confidence of the citizens of Oxford," he said.

As a strong supporter of the Multiculturalism Association of Nova Scotia, Goldberg expressed concern that "this type of thing will not encourage immigrants or newcomers who are not Christian to move to Oxford or to Nova Scotia."

Noting that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms allows Canadians to practise the religion of their choice, Goldberg said Oxford's motion "could be misconstrued as a diminution of such freedoms."

He hopes the councillors will reconsider their decree, but even if they don't, "I want to take this opportunity to wish people season's greetings, and to my Christian friends, a Merry Christmas."

'Jewish Singles World' is a form of community-building

No one, that is, but he and his equally concerned associate, Judith Weinroth. Together, they have developed what they believe is the first comprehensive plan to address the Jewish demographic time bomb in a manner that offers some hope for reversing the trend.

What it will take, they say, is the application of contemporary marketing techniques to grab the attention of single Jews. It starts with a mass media campaign in the mainstream press to attract Jewish singles to an interactive website. The site will gather data regarding the activities that interest the people who visit, then a group of professionals and volunteers will organize the social occasions that will bring together singles in a non-threatening atmosphere in which dating is not, repeat, not the prime focus.

Ultimately, their "Jewish Singles World" is a form of community-building, they say, with the idea that if you bring together single Jews with similar interests, dating and romance will flow naturally and a hoped-for population boom will transpire.

As they say in hockey, if you don't shoot you can't score, and likewise with the program envisioned by the two, if you don't bring Jews together, you won't get the next generation of Jews.

"When the Jewish community does not create the necessary tools to attract Jewish singles to their own community, they will go somewhere else," Maser asserted.

Weinroth, who chairs the intersynagogue singles of Toronto committee, has been involved in bringing singles together for close to nine years. She started at the Adath Israel Congregation, her home shul, where she and colleagues developed a number of programs that registered varying degrees of success. They later linked with other houses of worship to see if they could come up with a more co-ordinated, less sporadic approach.

Over the years, Weinroth said, there was very little growth in the number of program participants. Often you'd see the same people over and over again and after a while, even they became tired of the same old scene.

Weinroth realized the committee needed a professional's advice and so she asked her longtime friend, Maser, who has 35 years of experience in international marketing, to attend some of the committee's meetings.

Maser quickly realized the committee members were well intentioned but in over their heads.

They didn't really know their target audience – how many singles were out there and what they wanted in a singles program, he noted.

Since attending his first meeting more than three years ago, Maser has lent his help as a volunteer to develop a comprehensive approach to addressing the problem. The broad outlines of the solution were to "develop an environment where Jewish singles can meet." Programs offered in that environment must be recurring and interesting to the target audience, he said.

"No other way can be as attractive, comfortable or fulfilling as regularly meeting and participating with other singles within your own age group with similar interests and goals… and they are all Jewish," Maser and Weinroth say.

In researching the topic, Maser said he received calls from parents of teenagers and young adults "who cry they have nothing to offer their kids to tie them to the community."

Maser and Weinroth believe that by focusing on the web, they can grab the attention of today's media-savvy singles.

Leo Davids, at the Atkinson Faculty of York University, agrees with their diagnosis and their solution. Maser and Weinroth are bang on when they point to the disturbing demographic trend, he said. The Diaspora Jewish population is showing no signs of growth, "and even some shrinkage," he said. In Canada, there is "close to zero per cent growth," even after taking into account immigration from abroad.

Interestingly, the Jewish community is not alone with its tzuris. Its situation mirrors that of the general population, which has an even slightly higher singles rate than Jews. What's more, the trend among married couples is to small families. In 10 to 15 years, he predicted, a couple with a single child will be the most common family size among Jews.

Davids, professor emeritus of sociology, said Jewish Singles World and its focus on the new media is the right way to go. "It is in the nature of the culture of young adults. It has shifted from face-to-face contacts as in the past and more towards facing a flickering screen."

Maser and Weinroth consulted with Davids before they concluded their proposal. He believes not only does it employ technology in a way today's single can relate to, but it has the added benefit of going beyond a mere dating service to an attempt at "community building."

The Diaspora Jewish population is showing no signs of growth

As Maser and Weinroth outline their plan, the "heavy-duty media blitz should last three months to make people aware there is a Jewish organization and its website is up."

The interactive website will ask visitors for feedback about "what they want to do as Jewish people," and will feature information about available activities as well as links to other Jewish associations, groups and services.

"It is entirely based on the interaction of Jewish singles, for the first time being able to tell us what they want to be part of the Jewish community. It not only serves to develop and enhance the social community involvement of Jewish singles, but has the additional ability to improve family connections and participation," Maser said.

"Once we know their interests, some will be asked whether they'd be interested in volunteering to help make it happen" – whether creating a chess club, a cooking class, biking excursions – and they "will develop it."

Maser said the programs need not necessarily contain Judaic content. Most Jewish singles, he added, "are more historically attached than religiously attached and their participation with anything Jewish ranges from very little to nothing."

Maser and Weinroth are soliciting community support. They have received endorsements from Conservative and Reform rabbis groups, and Kolel, an adult Jewish learning organization.

They estimate they would require $300,000 as seed money to get the program up and running, to buy media placements, operate the website, rent venues, hire staff and operate Jewish Singles World in a professional manner.

They say it would be money well spent. "You have to develop population growth," Maser said. "We are nothing without people."

For more information, Maser may be reached at: jewishsinglesworld@yahoo.ca.

Brock U gets a new president

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Following a 10-month national search, Jack Lightstone has been appointed president and vice-chancellor of Brock University in St. Catharines.

The Ottawa native begins his five-year term as Brock's fifth president on July 1.

Lightstone is currently a professor of religion and associate chair in Quebec and Canadian Jewish studies at Concordia University in Montreal, where he recently served for nearly a decade as provost and vice-rector.

After graduating with a BA from Carleton University in 1972, Lightstone received both an MA and PhD from Brown University in Rhode Island and was a visiting research graduate fellow at Hebrew University in Jerusalem in 1974-75.

The author of six books, Lightstone is widely published in scholarly and professional journals and has lectured extensively. He is an expert on contemporary North American and ancient Judaism.

"This [appointment at Brock] probably represents the close of my teaching career, though perhaps not the end of my research career," Lightstone said.

In its 40 years of existence, Brock has grown to serve a student population of 17,000.

"Up until a few years ago, Brock was a small, largely undergraduate university with a few pockets of research excellence here and there… [but] since 1998, Brock has moved to develop its research capacity and its ability to offer a postgraduate education. I see my job as taking that potential and moving it along to a significant degree," Lightstone said.

"I hope to see Brock become a much more significant player in the realm of research without losing its sense of student-centredness at the undergraduate level… Brock is poised to become a major positive force in the Niagara Region in a way that far surpasses how it's been able to play that role until now."

Norris Walker, chair of Brock's board of trustees, called Lightstone "an outstanding scholar and exceptional leader and administrator with a highly collegial style and a focus on students."

Lightstone said he looks forward to becoming actively involved in the local Jewish community, and noted that within 24 hours of the announcement of his appointment, he was contacted by representatives of a local synagogue.

"They lost no time, and I am actually quite pleased that I can start relations with the Jewish community [of the Niagara Region] as quickly as possible," he said.

"I hope that as part of my extra-curricular activities I will be able to play a role in keeping the Brock [Jewish] community vibrant. I may not professionally be engaging in teaching, but I can certainly make a contribution as a Jewish educator," he said.

Lightstone and his wife, Dorothy Markiewicz, a psychology professor, are the parents of Etan and Jennifer, both of whom "have their own lives and their own careers" in Montreal.

Jewish fraternity comes back to York

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For more than a decade, Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi), has been York University's lone Jewish fraternity.

But Dan Perlin is determined to give students an alternative – again.

Perlin, an 18-year-old administrative studies student at York, said he was inspired to apply to start a Sigma Alpha Mu (SAM) colony on campus after he and a friend attended a student leadership conference in New Orleans last year.

He explained that a SAM chapter was once active at York, but about 15 years ago, it became dormant, likely due to a lack of interest.

Since York policy discourages fraternities on campus and does not recognize them as official campus groups, Perlin said he, like AEPi, has established a good relationship with Hillel, the Jewish campus organization that represents about 5,000 Jewish students at York.

Through Hillel, Perlin said, SAM he is able to advertise events and reach out to young Jews on campus.

On Nov. 22, Perlin and a group of about 10 students gained "colony" status, the first step to becoming an official chapter of the international fraternity.

Perlin said Delta Omicron, the new colony, was not created to compete with AEPi, but to give undergrads another option. "I think our campus is big enough for the both of us," said Perlin, the colony's president.

He said one of the things that separates SAM from AEPi is that it is not exclusive to Jewish students. "We are trying to reach out to Jews, to get Jewish leadership, but it's not exclusive."

Although the fraternity is meant to help hard-working students unwind, Perlin said it also wants to do good for the community.

"We want to be known as a cool chapter. We want it to have a party feel. We want to create an atmosphere where there are no worries, but we are also interested in the philanthropic effect we can have in the community," he said.

SAM, founded in 1909 at the College of the City of New York by eight Jewish men, boasts 67 chapters and colonies, including three new Canadian branches this year at York, McGill University and University of Western Ontario.

A new twist on latkes from the expert

By NORENE GILLETZ

The winners of the eighth annual Canadian Culinary Book Contest, sponsored by the University of Guelph and Cuisine Canada, were announced on Nov. 3 in Montreal. Two of Toronto's well-known Jewish cookbook authors walked away with the biggest awards.

The top English language cookbook award went to Lucy Waverman and her co-author James Chatto for A Matter of Taste: Inspired Seasonal Menus with Wines and Spirits to Match (HarperCollins).

Second prize went to Rose Reisman for Weekday Wonders: Healthy Light Meals for Every Day (Penguin).

Author of seven cookbooks, food professional Lucy Waverman has once again created a winner, offering a wide range of fabulous new dishes that are bursting with flavour and flair. A Matter of Taste is all about food that tastes terrific and features easy, elegant menus for the four seasons, with suggestions on how to match them with appropriate wines and spirits.

And if you are looking to escape the unhealthy, fast food rut, Weekday Wonders will put the wonder into weekday fare. You'll find a delicious blend of ethnic dishes and comfort food for the harried cook. Recipes are all lower in fat, calories and cholesterol, with a detailed nutrient analysis. Reisman also includes information on organization, stocking the cupboard and freezing, plus an entire month of wonderful menus to help make the dinner hour a no-brainer.

Both books offer many delicious recipes that can be prepared or adapted easily by the kosher cook.

With Chanukah quickly approaching, here are some terrific recipes offering a new twist on latkes, plus a memorable cookie recipe that's sure to please family and friends. Enjoy.

ROSE REISMAN'S POTATO-CRUSTED WHITE FISH WITH TARTAR SAUCE

The inspiration for this recipe is the traditional potato latke. Reisman thought that finely chopped potatoes would taste great if they formed a crust on fish. They definitely do. The tartar sauce is a tasty accompaniment.

1 large potato, peeled and finely cut into chunks (about 3/4 lb.)
3 tbsp. minced green onions
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
1½ tsp. minced garlic
¼ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
2 tsp. vegetable oil
1 lb. skinless firm white fish fillet, such as halibut, cod or sea bass, about 1 inch thick.

Sauce:
⅓ cup light sour cream
1 tbsp. light mayonnaise
1 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice
½ tsp. Dijon mustard

Preheat oven to 425. In a food processor, finely chop potatoes. Squeeze out excess moisture. In a bowl, stir together potatoes, green onions, dill, garlic, and salt and pepper.

In a nonstick skillet sprayed with cooking spray, heat oil over medium heat. Firmly press half of potato mixture onto one side of fish. Carefully place fish potato side down in skillet. Press fish firmly with a spatula and cook for 5 minutes on medium-high heat or until potato is browned. During the cooking, press the remaining potato on top of the fish. With a spatula, carefully turn fish over. Cook for another 5 minutes until fish is just cooked or until potato is browned. If fish is thicker than 1 inch, finish cooking in a preheated oven at 425 for 5 minutes, or until done.

To make sauce: In a bowl, stir ingredients together. (Can be made up to 2 days in advance.) Serve fish with sauce. Makes 4 servings.

Tip: Don't peel potatoes until ready to use or they will turn brown. Alternatively, place them in cold water until ready to use.

LUCY WAVERMAN'S SWEET POTATO GINGER PANCAKES

These pancakes can be made ahead and reheated in a 400-degree oven for 5 minutes before serving. Grate the sweet potatoes and onion by hand or in a food processor.

"התחברות"

"התחברות" הוא תקליט חובה, שיעשה לכם את הנסיעה באוטו לכיף אמיתי. אבל שישאר בינינו.

בחירות בחירות

במטה קסם תלך ישראל לבחירות מוקדמות. עמיר פרץ מטלטל את מפלגת העבודה ומביו שישיבה בממשלה רק תקטין את סיכוייהם. העבודה נכנסו לממשלה כדי לתמוך בהתנתקות מעזה, ועכשיו כשעזה היא היסטוריה-עדיף לפרץ שלא להיות מזוהה עם ממשלת שרון. מי שמשקשק מפרץ ממש הם הליכוד וש"ס, שתי מפלגות שנבנו מהשד העדתי ומהשנאה לממסד האשכנזי. והינה צומח ילד מעברות מאשדוד להיות מנהיג של השמאל, ויש סיכוי שהוא יצליח לשכנע את מצביעי עירות הפיתוח שבניית ופיתוח בגדה המערבית נעשית על חשבון התקציב של עירות הפיתוח. איך שלא מסתכלים על זה-ימין או שמאל-החזירה בחירתו של פרץ את הדמוקרטיה הישראלית לחיים האפשרות ששמעון פרס בן השמונים ושתיים ינהיג את מפלגתו היתה מחסלת את העבודה תוך יום, וגורמת לליכוד שליטה ללא שום אלטרנטיבה. במדינה שבה המוסר הציבורי עדיין נרמה של דרום אמריקה-חוסר אלטרנטיבה פוליטית זהה בעיני להרס הדמוקרטיה, אבל שישאר בינינו.

מפעם לפעם, בעיקר בעיתוני ערב חג, מעדכנים אותנו על השפה הישראלית הנוכחית. ולפעמים גם מזכירים איך נשמע הסלנג של שנות החמישים-שישים.

אז הינה טיפה מהמבחר הנוכחי:

אחי: מילת קרוב הלבבות האולטימטיבית. יד על הלב-כשאני שומע בארץ שאומרים "אחי" לכל מה שזז-זה נשמע כמו חנופה דביקה. אבל שישאר בינינו אני לא חי שם, אז אינני יכול ממש להרגיש דברים כמו שהם נשמעים שם.

יופי מוחמטי: מכונר, שום דבר, על משקל הנעלם במתמטיקה.

פלצן: בעל ניתונים מוזיפים, מתחסד, לעתים מתנשא.

והינה תזכורת לסלנג של שנות החמישים שנעלם זה מכבר:

בולפס: שמן.

קוויל מאווין: ארוך וטיפש.

מפזרת הפננות: מכוערת, הזוחשית של שנות החמישים.

מה יש לאמר- עברית קשה שפה.

L'chaim Retirement Home

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein with her mother Terry
Dear Judy:
I want to thank you, Esther, and your outstanding staff for how beautifully you helped my mother make the transition to retirement life. She is so happy with her new friends and the loving attention she gets from the staff. I am so impressed: the staff doesn't just "work" there, they really care about the residents and their families, and treat everyone with such dignity and warmth. L'chaim doesn't feel at all like an institution, it feels like a family. It was an excellent choice!
Best wishes, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Kosherfest attracts highest numbers in its history

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

NEW YORK — Whenever he thinks that Kosherfest has peaked he is once again proven wrong, says Menachem Lubinsky, the show's founding co-producer.

Speaking at the 17th annual Kosherfest, held last month at the Jacob Javits Convention Center in New York City, Lubinsky, publisher of Kosher Today, a trade publication for the kosher food industry, said the first Kosherfest, the annual kosher food and food service trade show, had 210 exhibitors and 1,500 visitors.

With 6,100 retail and food service buyers, manufacturers and distributors from 36 countries at this year's event, he said, "the show attracted the highest number of buyers in the 17-year history of the event."

The variety of products at the show included gourmet baked goods, higher-end desserts and confectionery, a greater emphasis on health and convenience, "and an impressive array of new products by some of the well-known and lesser-known kosher companies," Lubinsky said.

Speaking at the opening panel, Lubinsky said that outside of the United States, one of the largest food exhibitors was Israel, which "will increasingly help the kosher sections in [North American] supermarkets. The Israelis recently saw a gain of 35 per cent in the export of foods [to North America] in the past 12 months."

He said a study on population trends in Israel revealed that 70 per cent of Israelis eat kosher on a regular basis.

Marcia Mogelonsky, who heads up kosher consumer research at Mintel, an international global research organization, said that in North America, "the growth of kosher food among the younger set is more a function of age than of income, but both these issues are interconnected."

She said that while 58 per cent of those polled said they kept kosher occasionally, 67 per cent of them earn less than $30,000 a year.

Younger consumers were the largest group who keep kosher all the time at 22 per cent, followed by the 55- to 64-year-old age group (18 per cent), the 35- to 54-year-old age group (11 per cent) and the over 65 (nine per cent), she said.

"The younger set also led all other age groups in believing that kosher was healthier and safer, and in the desire for vegetarian and dairy-free products and a product list that was consistent with halal [Muslim dietary laws]. There is always an undercurrent that kosher is better. It is like the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval," she said.

There is also an increase in the number of young people buying kosher food because they are turning to Judaism in order for their kids to have a Jewish background, she said.

The numbers are good news for marketers of kosher food, she said, "because they indicate that kosher will not fade away with older, traditional consumers, but will continue to grow with the new and emerging younger groups."

Lubinsky said that "rather than represent kosher as going mainstream, it is more the case today that a cross section [of consumers] covet the quality of kosher products.

"Consumers interested in gourmet or organic are attracted to the kosher certification as added security," he said.

"We don't know who is buying kosher but we do know that it is more than the core group of Jews. It does not represent the number of Jews in the marketplace.

"[I can say] that the world is going kosher. It is getting harder to find a company that does not have some sort of kosher certification."

More and more companies are becoming kosher, he said, because [they know] kosher food is not just consumed by Jews. "Big companies, small companies and specialty food companies are making efforts to go kosher, as it seems to have equal bragging rights with organic and natural."

The companies that do not have certification "do not appreciate the opportunity they have. There are pockets of kosher consumers everywhere," he added.

If making something kosher doesn't change the taste, he said, "there is really no reason not to go kosher, because kosher is perceived as better and healthier.

"We're going to see more kosher products related to healthier eating, such as whole grain products, and low salt and low sugar products."

New products showcased at Kosherfest include Sabra's portable hummus snacks; Manischewitz's honey apple butter spread, its creamy horseradish in four flavours, and a variety of pareve cake mixes; Labruite's self-heating meals; pareve Passover cookies from Matzot Aviv; and Healthy Times organic and soy-free baby food.

One of the show's highlights included a sculpture of New York City mayor Michael Bloomberg made out of Sabra hummus.

This year's Kosherfest drew thousands of visitors.

Recipes help get ready for festival of Chanukah

3 cups packed grated peeled sweet potatoes
½ cup grated onions
2 tbsp. grated gingerroot
1 egg
¼ cup all-purpose flour
½ tsp. baking powder
salt and freshly ground pepper
2 tbsp. vegetable oil, approximately

Squeeze all excess moisture from grated sweet potatoes and onions and combine. Stir in ginger, egg, flour, baking powder, salt and pepper.

Heat 2 tbsp. oil in a large heavy skillet over medium-high heat. Drop sweet potato mixture into hot skillet ¼ cup at a time and flatten with a spoon. Cook on both sides for about 3 minutes per side, or until pancakes are golden brown and crisp. Continue to cook pancakes in batches until all batter is used (about 12 pancakes), adding more oil as needed. Drain pancakes on paper towels. Serves 4.

LUCY'S CHOCOLATE CHERRY CHUNK COOKIES

Everyone loves desserts and it is a treat to have them for a feast. Whenever Lucy has a dessert buffet, she plans to have at least one chocolate, one lemon, one tart and one cake. She also likes to include cookies, because that is all some people want with their coffee.

Lucy declares that this is the best chocolate chip cookie ever. The chips are chunks of chocolate and the dried cherries provide extra flavour, though you can omit them if desired. Use dark chocolate chunks instead of white if you prefer.

½ cup butter
4 oz. bittersweet chocolate
1½ cups granulated sugar
2 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
1½ cups all-purpose flour
½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
8 oz. white chocolate, cut in small chunks
1 cup dried cherries

Preheat oven to 350. Line baking sheets with parchment paper. Melt butter in a pot over low heat. Add bittersweet chocolate and stir until smooth. Remove from heat and transfer to a large bowl. Beat in sugar, eggs and vanilla.

Combine flour, baking powder and salt. Blend flour mixture into chocolate mixture. Stir in white chocolate chunks and dried cherries.

Drop dough onto baking sheets in 1 tbsp. mounds about 2 inches apart. Bake for 10 to 11 minutes, or until cookies are glossy, cracked on surface and soft inside. Do not overbake. Remove from oven and allow cookies to set on baking sheets for 5 minutes. Transfer cookies to a wire rack to cool completely. Store in an airtight container for up to 2 weeks. Makes about 4 dozen.

At least five killed in suicide bombing at Netanya mall

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NETANYA, Israel — At least five people were killed Monday and more than 50 others were wounded, four of them seriously, when a suicide bomber blew himself up at around 11:30 a.m. at the entrance to Hasharon shopping mall in Netanya.

The wounded were taken to hospitals in the area.

Islamic Jihad said it had carried out the attack. An earlier claim in the name of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades was swiftly denied by the Fatah-linked group.

The Hezbollah television station, Al-Manar, said the Islamic Jihad's military arm, the Jerusalem Brigades, made the claim in a telephone call to the station.

The group later identified the attacker as 21-year-old Lutfi Amin Abu Salem, from the village of Kafr Rai, between the West Bank towns of Jenin and Tul Karm. A video released by Islamic Jihad showed the bomber posing with a grenade launcher and an assault rifle.

The group is responsible for all four suicide bombings carried out since a joint ceasefire declaration last February. It has said it reserves the right to retaliate for any perceived Israeli violations.

"A suicide bomber who tried to enter Hasharon mall in Netanya was spotted by passersby after he raised their suspicions," said Avi Sasson, deputy police chief in the area.

"Two policemen at the scene pulled out their guns and ordered him to halt and to take his hands out of his pockets. At that stage, he blew himself up," Sasson said.

Analysis

An eye-witness said he saw a man "moving like a robot," and someone shouted to the security guards at entrance to the shopping centre: "Suicide bomber, suicide bomber!"

The guards stopped the man and pushed him up against the wall, as nearby police officers rushed to help. The bomber then detonated the explosives in his bag. One of the security guards was killed and the policemen were wounded.

"The fact that the security guard and policemen managed to identify the bomber meant that they prevented a major disaster," said Israel Police Commissioner Moshe Karadi.

"The city of Netanya is located on the seam line… and this is the third time that bombers have succeeded in carrying out an attack there," he said.

Deputy Public Security Minister Yaakov Edri told Israel Radio there had been no specific warnings ahead of the attack, a fact repeated by Karadi.

David Baker, an official in the Prime Minister's Office, said the attack was the direct outcome of the Palestinian Authority's (PA) failure to dismantle the terrorist organizations in the territories.

"The Palestinian Authority refuses to take the necessary steps to prevent terror, including dismantling of terror infrastructure and incarceration of terrorists, and we saw the result today in Netanya," Baker told Ha'aretz. "There can be no substitute for these steps. The PA adamantly refuses to implement such a step."

"The whole process of reconciliation between us and the Palestinians is based on the principle that terrorist groups will be disarmed," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said Monday. "Unfortunately, things like what happened today happen because terrorist groups remain armed."

Ra'anan Gissin, a senior adviser to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, echoed that message. "The fact that the Palestinian Authority is taking no action whatsoever against the armed terrorist groups results in such attacks," he said.

Gissin called on the PA to take immediate action against militant groups. "The fact that there are elections does not exonerate them from fulfilling their obligations," he said, referring to a PA parliamentary vote set for January.

"We feel free to take whatever action is necessary to protect our citizens, including targeted interceptions of those who perpetrate those actions. If they are not brought to justice, we will bring justice to them," Gissin said.

In the wake of the bombing, Sharon announced that he would convene a special meeting of the security cabinet Monday evening.

Police also went on high alert across the country Monday, following the bombing.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said the attack serves as additional proof that the PA is not doing enough to stop terror.

Likud MK Uzi Landau said the suicide bombing is "a sign of things to come" if the government yields more land Palestinians seek for a state.

Labor party leader Amir Peretz condemned the attack, calling for an "uncompromising war" on terrorism, which he said is "the enemy of democracy, peace and Israeli society."

PA President Mahmoud Abbas also condemned the suicide bombing and ordered the arrest of those involved, his office said in a statement.

"This operation… against civilians causes the most serious harm to our commitment to the peace process, and the Palestinian Authority will not go easy on whoever is found to be responsible for this operation," the statement quoted him as saying.

Condemnation also came from senior Palestinian Authority official Saeb Erekat, who said the attack was detrimental to the Palestinian cause.

"I believe that this harms Palestinian interests and is another act to sabotage efforts to revive the peace process and to sabotage the Palestinian elections," Erekat said.

The attack was the first suicide bombing in Israel since Oct. 26, when a bomber killed six people in Hadera, just north of Netanya.

The coastal city has been a frequent target of suicide bombings in the past five years of violence.

In July 2005, five people were killed when an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber blew himself up near a shopping mall. The bomber, identified as 18-year-old Ahmed Abu Khalil from the West Bank village of Atil, blew himself at on a pedestrian crossing near the entrance to the shopping centre.

PA cannot combat militant groups

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Monday's terror attack in Netanya was yet another indication of the weakness of the Palestinian Authority.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas has without a doubt been the most outspoken Palestinian leader in expressing opposition to terror attacks and violent opposition against Israel. He is one of the few who continued to declare, throughout the intifadah years, that violence was causing serious damage to the Palestinian cause.

But it seems Abbas has little practical ability to do anything other than issue vague and ambiguous statements – like the one he issued on Monday – condemning attacks on innocent Israeli and Palestinian civilians. He has no ability to put an end to the terror attacks carried out by a relatively small organization such as Islamic Jihad, which was responsible for Monday's attack.

All the official Palestinian spokespeople have admitted that the PA is unable to combat and disarm militant groups. They say the PA intends to disarm the militant groups only after the elections for the Palestinian Legislative Council set for seven weeks from now.

But many are wondering if the PA will be able to make good on its promises even then. The reason: The PA security services are filled with chaos and anarchy.

For example, the Fatah movement's primary elections held in the last two weeks were so wracked with violence that the election supervisory committee had no choice but to cancel the voting in a series of districts.

Gun battles actually broke out next to a number of polling stations in the Gaza Strip after armed groups complained of ballot fraud and errors in voting registration lists.

In Gaza, it was decided that the Fatah candidates for parliament would be determined by holding public opinion polls rather than internal party primaries.

The PA security services are only attempting to fight Palestinian crime gangs. These operations – unlike those aimed at combating the militant groups – enjoy wide Palestinian public support. For the past few days, the PA security forces have been busy in the West Bank and Gaza attempting to locate and confiscate vehicles stolen from Israel.

But even in the war on theft, it seems, Abbas and his colleagues are having problems.

The same day as the Netanya terror attack, a Fatah-Tanzim member, Anis Ajouri, was shot while opposing PA police who attempted to confiscate a stolen vehicle from him.

In the last two weeks in the Gaza Strip, a full-blown battle was waged by rival clans around the northern village of Beit Hanun. Six people were killed. PA police were helpless to arrest those involved – all of them were carrying firearms.

"The gangs in Gaza have more weapons than the entire [PA] police and security forces," a journalist in the Strip reported recently.

Given the current situation, not a single senior Palestinian official dares to mention the disarmament of the Islamic Jihad.

Sharon hints at Iran strike

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon hinted that military action, by Israel or another country, would succeed in halting Iran's nuclear program. "Such a capability exists," Sharon told reporters when asked if there could be military means of preventing Iran from getting the bomb. While he endorsed European-led efforts to curb Iranian uranium enrichment, a key step for making nuclear weapons, Sharon said Israel would not sit idly by if diplomacy fails. "Israel, and not just Israel, cannot accept a situation in which Iran has nuclear weapons," he said. "Israel is not helpless and is taking all the steps it needs to be taking." Foreign experts speculate that Israel, which bombed Iraq's nuclear reactor at Osirak in 1981, could take similar action against Iran if it believes the Islamic republic is on the verge of acquiring nuclear weapons.

Israelis' AIDS campaign

A group of Israelis launched a bell-ringing campaign aimed at raising AIDS awareness. The Bells 4 AIDS campaign, created by the Jerusalem AIDS Project, said that more than a million people worldwide would take up its call to ring bells for 60 seconds to mark World AIDS Day. "Our greatest reward would be to hear a million bells ringing around the world, making a collective noise for more awareness about HIV/AIDS and share the responsibility in prevention and care," the chairman of the project, Hanny Epelboim, told the Jerusalem Post. According to the newspaper, the group is planning to set a new world record in bell-ringing for a public health cause.

U.S. Greens urge divestment

The U.S. Green Party last week called for divestment from Israel, saying it backs the "serious consideration" of replacing Israel with a secular democratic state in Israel and the Palestinian areas. The resolution "calls for divestment from and boycott of the State of Israel until such time as the full individual and collective rights of the Palestinian people are realized," including a return of Palestinians displaced by Israel's 1948 independence war and their descendants.

New German leader backs Israel

Germany will stand by Israel, the country's new chancellor said. In her first speech to the German Parliament as chancellor last week, Angela Merkel stressed her commitment to the Jewish state and said Iran, whose president recently called for Israel's destruction, must co-operate with International Atomic Energy Agency inspections. In the first official contact between the new chancellor and a representative of the Israeli government, Merkel told Israel's deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert, that she'll visit Israel in the near future.

Jewish philosopher at centre of riot debate

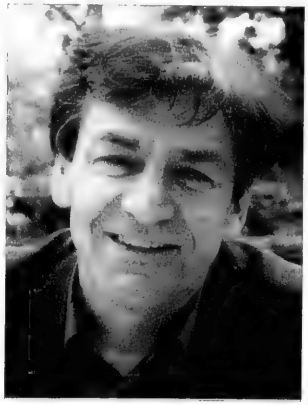
By LAUREN ELKIN
JTA

PARIS — A prominent French Jewish intellectual has come under attack for criticizing the public reaction to recent Muslim riots as too sympathetic.

Critics called Alain Finkielkraut racist for emphasizing the ethnicity and religion of the rioters in a Nov. 18 interview with Ha'aretz.

Finkielkraut, 56, was quoted as saying that "in France there are also other immigrants whose situation is difficult – Chinese, Vietnamese, Portuguese – and they're not taking part in the riots. Therefore, it is clear that this is a revolt with an ethno-religious character."

Contrary to the widespread opinion that the riots could not be "reduced to an unalloyed reaction to French racism," Finkielkraut argued that they were attacks not against France "as a former colonial power" but "against France as a European country. Against France, with its Christian or Judeo-Christian tradition."



Alain Finkielkraut

The comments by Finkielkraut, a former leader of the left-wing 1968 student uprisings who in recent years has been characterized as a "neo-conservative" because of his support for Israel, launched a French version of the "culture wars" that have periodically raged in the United States over the past few decades.

The controversy erupted last month when excerpts from the interview were translated into French and appeared in Le Monde newspaper. The truncated version of the interview caused an immediate sensation, and a lively debate arose in the French media over the "Finkielkraut Affair."

On Nov. 24, the Movement Against Racism filed charges of racism against Finkielkraut. Racism is a criminal offence in France.

Finkielkraut apologized on the Europe 1 television station the next day, saying his comments had been taken out of context.

The Movement Against Racism then withdrew the charges, though Mouloud Aounit, the group's secretary general, said he doubted the sincerity of Finkielkraut's apology.

Finkielkraut, 56, is the son of Polish Jewish immigrants to France, survivors of Auschwitz whose parents died there. His theories on Holocaust denial have helped make him one of the most respected philosophers in contemporary France.

He said he was perturbed by the riots not only as a Frenchman, but as a Jew. As he told Ha'aretz, "When an Arab torches a school, it's rebellion. When a white guy does it, it's fascism. I'm colour blind. Evil is evil, no matter what colour it is. And this evil, for the Jew that I am, is completely intolerable."

Finkielkraut also said the French educational system breeds a "post-colonial mind-set" that offers sympathy for the rioters and, he claimed, is "creating an infrastructure for the new anti-Semitism."

Laurent Joffrin, editor-in-chief of the newspaper Le Nouvel Observateur, said that Finkielkraut "is certainly not a racist. But in speaking like one, he reinforces the dangerous propaganda popularized" by racists, and "only exacerbates the tensions."

Some Jewish community groups were outraged by the way Finkielkraut's comments were "butchered" in the French media.

Writing on the website of the Union of French Jewish Employers and Professionals, Menahem Macina defended Finkielkraut and accused Sylvain Cypel, author of the Le Monde article, of "a high degree of libel."

Finkielkraut's legal troubles aren't over yet. In the Ha'aretz interview, he referred to the French comedian Dieudonne as the "guardian of [the new] anti-Semitism in France."

Dieudonne, who has been prosecuted several times for anti-Semitic remarks, responded by pressing libel charges against Finkielkraut.

But Finkielkraut found one supporter in an unlikely place. In an interview published Monday with the Nouvel Observateur, Muslim intellectual Tariq Ramadan defended Finkielkraut's sincerity and commended him for expressing views that "other French intellectuals, politicians, or journalists think as well but are simply more calculated" about expressing.

Still, Ramadan said he believed the interview revealed Finkielkraut's "strange and dangerous evolution."

OLD FOES, FRIENDS AND NOW, ALLIES

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Sunday praised his new Kadima ally Shimon Peres, and offered him his choice of portfolios should his party win the general elections set for March 28. "Shimon can fulfil any post, I believe with great success. Regardless of the job Shimon picks, it is crystal clear he will be a full and central partner in the diplomatic process," Sharon, with Peres by his side, told a news conference in Jerusalem. In November, Sharon resigned from the Likud Party, which he helped found, and last week Peres left the Labor Party, after being a member for more than five decades.

Iran may be months from nuclear bomb: UN nuclear watchdog

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

If Iran's Natanz enrichment plant becomes fully operational, the Iranians could be a few months away from a nuclear weapon, the head of the United Nations International Atomic Energy Agency told the British newspaper The Independent in an interview published Monday.

"If they start enriching, this is a major issue and a serious concern for the international community," Mohamed El Baradei told the newspaper.

"I know they are trying to acquire the full fuel cycle. I know that acquiring the full fuel cycle means that a country is months away from nuclear weapons, and that applies to Iran and everybody else," he added.

Meanwhile, Iran responded fiercely Monday to a call by Likud Knesset member Benjamin Netanyahu for Israel to deal with the Iranian nuclear program in the same way it did with the Iraqi atomic facility it destroyed in a 1981 air strike.

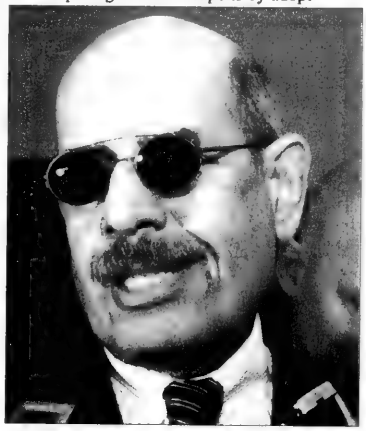
Iran on Monday reiterated a warning from the day before that Israel would pay a heavy price for any attempt to wipe out its nuclear program.

"The Zionist regime is well aware that if it made such a grave mistake, the Iranian reaction would be devastating," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Hamid-Reza Assefi was quoted as saying by the Iranian student news agency ISNA.

The Iranian Foreign Ministry had said Sunday that Tehran would respond with severity to any Israeli actions against it.

Netanyahu told Israel Radio on Sunday that "the Iranian threat is an existential one, as it is a country that declared its plans to destroy Israel and is developing the tools to carry out this destruction.

"In this regard, I will continue the legacy of [former Israeli prime minister] Menachem Begin, who thwarted Iran's neighbour, Iraq, from acquiring nuclear weapons by adopting bold and daring measures. I believe that is what Israel needs to do."



Mohamed El Baradei

Netanyahu said he has stated, in various forums, that everything possible must be done to prevent Iran's nuclear armament. "This is the Israeli goverment's primary obligation. If it is not done by the current government, I plan to lead the next government to stop the Iranians."

Netanyahu clarified that he was referring to "all actions necessary to prevent a situation in which Iran will threaten us with nuclear weapons."

Netanyahu, who is vying to become chair of Likud, also said that if Prime Minister Ariel Sharon takes action to thwart the Iranian threat, he would enjoy "my full support, regardless of political considerations."

Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Dan Halutz said Sunday that he is skeptical that diplomatic pressure will put a halt to Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"The fact that the Iranians are successful time after time in getting away from international pressure... encourages them to continue their nuclear project," Halutz told foreign reporters.

"I believe that the political means that are used by the Europeans and the U.S. to convince the Iranians to stop the project will not succeed."

Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful, civilian purposes. But last month, the European Union accused Iran of having documents that show how to make nuclear warheads, and joined the United States in warning Tehran that it could face referral to the UN Security Council for possible sanctions.

In October, a call by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for Israel to be wiped off the map drew global condemnation and gave greater impetus to efforts to deter Iran's nuclear plans.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said talks between Iran and European countries, which had broken down in August after Tehran restarted uranium conversion, would resume.

Ahead of the renewed diplomatic meetings between Britain, France, Germany and Iran, an Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson said Tehran was optimistic about the talks.

Sharon said Sunday that Iran must not be allowed to become a nuclear power.

A vivid biography of a Jewish American hitman

Blood Relation by Eric Konigsberg, HarperCollins.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the late 19th century, New York City's Lower East Side, populated in the main by Jewish immigrants, was uncharitably described by one observer as a place where "the criminal instincts that are so often found naturally in Russian and Polish Jews come to the surface..."

The phraseology smacks of American nativist anti-Semitism, and can be duly dismissed as an anti-Jewish canard. But what is indubitably true is that the first half of the 20th century in the United States was a period in which Jewish gangsters, from Arnold Rothstein to Meyer Lansky, were disproportionately prominent on the crime scene.

Eric Konigsberg

Harold (Kayo) Konigsberg, a ruthless Mafia enforcer and a notorious hitman, is one of the last relics from that era of Jewish criminality. A freelance gunman whom Life magazine once called "the most dangerous uncaged criminal on the East Coast," he was not the typical upwardly mobile American Jewish boy who aspired to be a doctor, lawyer or accountant.

Born in 1927 in Bayonne, N.J., he is the subject of Blood Relation, a vivid biography by his nephew, Eric Konigsberg, a writer whose work has appeared in The New Yorker and Rolling Stone. In this, his first book, Konigsberg paints a nuanced portrait of a cold-blooded killer who has spent the better part of his life in prison. But Blood Relation, while primarily biographical, is also a story of family, Jewish identity and justice.

Heshy, as he was known by his Yiddish name, was a rough-and-tumble intimidating kid who, at the age of 11, walked into a car dealership and demanded a test drive. "Yeah, kid, when you grow up," the salesman said.

"No, I mean now," said Konigsberg, sticking a knife under the man's chin.

The upshot was that he drove the car through the plate-glass window onto the road.

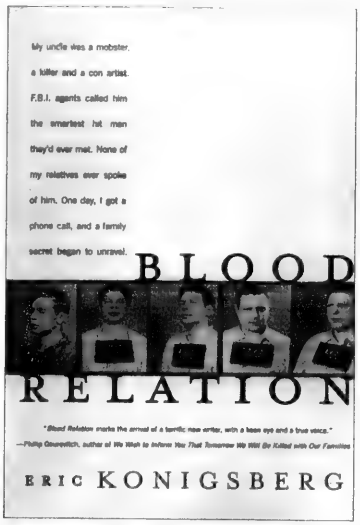
As might be expected, Konigsberg dropped out of school and drifted into the orbit of legendary mobster Abner (Longy) Zwillman, who became his mentor and employer.

Big and hefty, Konigsberg was soon running numbers for Zwillman and earning more than his father, Mendel, a Galician Jew who was a bootlegger.

On the side, Konigsberg, a semi-pro boxer, broke bones when disrupting pro-Nazi meetings organized by the American Bund.

Konigsberg's first brush with the law occurred in 1950, when he was imprisoned for 14 years for robbing an appliance store of $450 and severely beating its owner.

Released in 1958, he returned to a life of crime. As the author puts it, "Harold built his C.V. in a remarkably short time... His portfolio – everything from bookmaking to nightclubs to resort hotels to hijacking to trucking – owed its breadth to his equal-opportunity relations with the Mafia's various families."



His connection with Italian Americans transcended business. Konigsberg's wife, Catie, was an ethnic Italian whose first husband had been "whacked" by the Mafia for some transgression. He and Catie had two daughters.

Konigsberg was also a gun for hire. He committed at least 10 and possibly 20 "hits." In 1962, he received a contract to kill Anthony Castellito, a candidate for the presidency of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

This "hit" led to his downfall. He was thrown into jail, and there he remains, in the Auburn Correctional Facility, where he is serving a life sentence for murder.

The author met his infamous granduncle in 1997 after receiving a voice mail from him. For all intents and purposes, Konigsberg was a stranger to him.

"The life of my granduncle is something my family went to considerable lengths to ignore and at times conceal," he explains, saying he first heard about him in 1985 when he was attending a boarding school.

"I felt a detached thrill to know that I had a notorious criminal in my family, to know we had a secret at all," he writes.

He was not the only person in awe of Konigsberg. Many Jewish boys in Bayonne looked up to Konigsberg because he defied the ageless stereotype that Jews are physically weak.

Konigsberg's last day of freedom was Oct. 23, 1963, when he was arrested for murdering Castellito. But life was hardly difficult for him, even as a jailbird.

Having bought off the warden, he lived luxuriously in a private apartment in the third-floor library, with his own television, telephone, radio, refrigerator, hot plate, desk, sofa and parlour chairs.

Proud of his command of current events, he subscribes to the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Time magazine and Newsweek. For years, he read the Criminal Law Reporter and the New York Law Journal.

On Rosh Hashanah, he invites all the Jewish inmates to services and sends for pizza.

One of his frequent guests was a young woman whom law-enforcement officials identified as a drug addict and a $50-a-night call girl who claimed she had been a Rose Bowl Queen at the University of Southern California.

Konigsberg has appealed for clemency four times, but to no avail. His last parole hearing was held in April 2004, and a new hearing has been set for 2006.

According to his nephew, he has few regrets.

"Listen, you ever go to California to the Simon Wiesenthal Center and see what they did to our women and children?" he'd said to me in the Auburn visitors' room, sucking out what remained from a foil packet of cream cheese. "That just makes me feel less sick about living with myself.

"Then he raised his voice. 'I did a lot of fucking bad things that I'm ashamed of and I been regretting it ever since.' He was on the verge of yelling. 'But I never went outside my circle. I never did anything to innocent people that wasn't trying to hurt me. I didn't go around burglarizing or raping or mugging.'"

Konigsberg is a hardened criminal whose life story is paradigmatic of a time when far too many poverty-stricken American Jews were drawn into criminal activities.

In Blood Relation, Konisgberg's nephew writes about his uncle's descent into crime with commendable detachment. But his book is overly long, stuffed with too much padding. He could have wrapped it up in 50 to 100 less pages, with far better results.

But overall, this is a satisfying account of a fairly unusual Jewish man.

One Family helps victims of terrorist attacks

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ask Ron Kehrmann about terrorists, and he'll tell you without hesitating that they are all blind.

Kehrmann's 18-year-old daughter Tal was killed "on March 5, 2003, at 2:14 p.m – 32 months and four days ago," after boarding a bus in Haifa.

"The man killed 17 people, among whom were two Christians, one Muslim, and one Druze girl from Tal's school. This shows that they'll kill people of all religions. They're goal is to disrupt life.

"The mutual life in Haifa between all religions bothers them. They want chaos and dissension."

Kehrmann was in Toronto recently on behalf of One Family Fund, an organization that provides financial, emotional, psychological and material assistance to victims of terror.

Also here – they visited Montreal and Ottawa as well – were Adi Melamed, who was involved in a terrorist attack on Sukkot more than a year ago, and Shoshana and Momy Malka, whose daughter and four granddaughters were killed when two terrorists fired at their car in the Gaza Strip.

Kehrmann said that Tal and her friend, Liz Katzman, had been shopping for prom dresses when they got a call from a friend who said she had found dresses at a different store.

"They just happened to get on the bus at that moment. Another 13-year-old boy had stayed later at school to make Purim plans, and others took the bus because they thought Haifa was safe. Everyone who was killed had a story."

Before that day, says Kerhrmann, he was not involved in social activism. "I am a swimmer, and swimmers don't talk. I decided, though, that I had to do anything I could to fight terrorism.

"I compare terrorists to pirates; they were also a threat to society. If we all gather together, we can eliminate them. I vowed that if I could not keep my daughter safe, I wouldn't let anyone forget her."

He became involved in One Family, he says, after befriending the father of the Druze girl who was killed in the attack. "He told me that One Family is an organization that gives from its heart. What they do cannot be given a monetary value."

Kerhrmann said the organization sent his son, then 12, to summer camp, where he met other bereaved brothers so he wouldn't feel alone.

"People don't know what to say to us. It is a natural reaction. They become uncomfortable.

"When we get together with other bereaved parents, though, we have a common denominator. We're free to talk about many issues. There is no wall between us."

Melamed, 28, was injured while spending time at a beach 30 minutes from Eilat. "A car exploded eight metres away from me and parts of the car hit me. More than 40 people were injured and three died, including one of my friends.

"At first I thought I was paralyzed because I couldn't feel my arm, but in reality I was saved because it missed my artery by four millimetres. I had three operations in three days. It is a miracle that I got feeling back in my arm."

She did not know anything about One Family until then, she says, and a volunteer visited her with a mug of chocolate and the number to the organization.

"What's unique about them is that they reach out but they do not push. They focus on what you need [whether] it is psychological help or financial help. It's not a political organization – they just want to help hurt people in the best way possible."

Pam Albert, Canadian executive director of One Family Fund, says those involved in the organization are committed to helping people whose lives have changed due to terrorism.

"We have made a long-term commitment because it can take years for a victim to get back to a pre-attack functioning level. We're also concerned with the long-term care of orphans and children.

"We're unique because we take a comprehensive approach to helping – we look at all their needs."

In Canada, she says, they focus on matching families and communities here with families in Israel. "In the 1½ years we've been in operation, we've raised more than $700,000, and have helped more than 2,300 families. There are still 8,000 families who need help, though."

Also unique about One Family, she says, is that it promotes an intergenerational culture of giving. "Many families adopt Israeli families, so everyone gets involved."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. We are going on vacation and will be eating in restaurants for two weeks, I am worried about what I am going to eat for breakfasts. Do you have any suggestions?

A. Probably the safest choice is to order poached eggs on toast. It is okay to eat eggs every day since it is fat in food that raises our cholesterol and one egg does not contain that much fat (only five grams each).

Order one egg with a piece of whole wheat or rye bread and one cup of fruit. As long as the bread isn't buttered, you can't go wrong with this meal as it is high protein and will fill you up without a lot of calories.

For variety, try hot oatmeal on some mornings, but watch the portion size and beware of the delicious accompaniments such as dried fruit, brown sugar and cream. You could also order an egg-white omelette made without butter or oil in the pan.

Q. I have been suffering from reflux or heartburn and I am wondering what foods to avoid?

A. First, you should have several small meals each day and avoid eating late at night. Also, skipping meals can often aggravate heartburn, as can large meals.

Some foods can trigger heartburn, however, they can vary among people, so pay attention to your body and avoid those foods that seem to bother you. Common triggers are coffee and tea, spices, onions, pop and carbonated drinks, tomatoes (all forms including fresh tomatoes, sauce and soup), alcohol, pepper, citrus fruit, fruit juices, fatty and fried foods, chocolate and peppermint.

Make sure that you see your doctor about your symptoms. They may not be controlled by diet alone and can become serious if left untreated.

Q. I enjoy coffee and I drink only one or two cups a day, but I am wondering what kind is the healthiest to drink and if decaf is better than regular?

A. People who are caffeine sensitive, should drink only caffeine-free coffee. Swiss-water-process decaf is definitely a healthier choice than chemically decaffeinated coffee.

How do you know if you are caffeine sensitive? You may experience shakiness or a feeling of excitablilty from caffeine. If you feel like you cannot go a day without your caffeine fix, then you are likely sensitive or addicted and should reduce your consumption or cut it out all together.

I am glad to hear that your consumption is moderate. I generally recommend no more than two cups a day. Unless you are either addicted or sensitive to caffeine, it doesn't really matter which you choose.

ALLI SHAPIRO-AMAR

PERSONALITY OF THE MONTH

I was diagnosed with Hodgkin's disease seven years ago. Since then, I have learned the greatest lesson is to love without limits and to understand that love can last forever.

Being ill had made me believe that I was not going to achieve many of the same things my peers were. However, with the support of my family, doctors, and friends my goals were achieved. One remarkable high was meeting my husband-to-be, Philip Amar. When I told him about my illness, he didn't run or look at me with different eyes; he stayed and he hasn't left my side ever since.

The months leading up to our wedding were physically and emotionally draining. I knew that the only person who could illustrate what we were really feeling was Al Gilbert. He has captured some of the most important times in my family's life and now I have the greatest pictures to remember the greatest day.

My new focus is to raise funds to provide a support network for young adults dealing with cancer. My family, led by the late Oscar and Florence Shainhouse, taught us to give back to the community, to appreciate education, religion and family. Now, with the help of my mom, Pam Shainhouse, Alli's Journey will become an indispensable and successful organization.

Every month, Gilbert & Associates features a signature portrait from the current work or archives of Al Gilbert, C.M., Master Photographer. The timeless quality of classical portraiture has always depended on the special relationship between the photographer and his subject.

Now you can sit for a one-of-a-kind, signature portrait by Al Gilbert, member of the Order of Canada and the artist who photographed Pope John Paul II. Your portrait may be proudly displayed at home and office and will join a gallery of prominent Gilbert portraits, soon to be donated to the National Archives.

You may book an appointment for a sitting at your home, office or our studio at 170 Davenport Road, Toronto by calling 416 923-1995 or email gilbertandassociates@rogers.com. Visit our website at www.gilbertandassociates.ca

Exciting Times Ahead for USDS

These are exciting times at United Synagogue Day School, with the announcements of new programs, renovations and, announced most recently, a plan to build a new facility at the UJA Federation's exciting Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

The school's Bathurst campus, in partnership with Beth Tzedec Synagogue, is working on a joint renovation that features larger classrooms, break-out and study rooms, green space and a full size gym, among many other improvements.

As part of the school's long-term strategy, USDS has announced plans to merge the Richmond Hill and Bayview Campuses at the Bayview and Finch location in September 2006 for a period of two years until their new campus is ready in September 2008.

USDS is also unveiling new programs including a Nursery and a differentiated Jewish studies program — both at the Bayview Campus, which will enhance this campus' offerings into the future. The Nursery program will provide a five morning a week program for children who will be three years of age by December 31. The program will run from 8:45 to 11:45 a.m. and will include a wide range of activities including: early-numeracy and early-literacy skills, an integrated Jewish studies program, arts and crafts, music and creative movement.

For grade 1 and 2 students, who may be having difficulty developing in the regular classroom setting, the new Yesod/Foundation class will give these students the opportunity to build a strong foundation in basic skills. This program will provide these children with individualized attention in general studies while enabling them to fully participate in all co-curricular aspects of school life. The customized curriculum will initially focus on the general studies program and gradually integrate Hebrew language instruction; all grade - appropriate teaching of prayers, holidays and customs will be included on an ongoing basis.

A program designed to deliver the current Jewish curriculum in English — the Telem/Adaptive Program — for students who would benefit from learning Jewish Studies in their first language, is also being introduced at Bayview in September 2006. During the Jewish studies portion of the day, classes will be taught, discussed and evaluated in English, with the integration of texts, key vocabulary and terms in Hebrew. Hebrew language arts will continue to be delivered in Hebrew. This program will initially be introduced in grades 4 and 6 and will eventually span from grades 4 to 8.

Lucy Cohen, Head of School, is very optimistic about the future, explaining, "the new programs and facilities will only serve to enrich the USDS experience. All our efforts are directed to enhancing the educational and professional experience for our students and educators in a flourishing Conservative day school."

This sentiment is mirrored by USDS President, Allen Gales, adding that, "these new developments renew our commitment to the Greater Toronto Jewish community, and will maintain USDS' long-standing role as a leader in education."

For additional information about these or any other programs as USDS, please contact Rosemary Tile, Admissions Coordinator at 416.224.8737 x 137 or by email at rosemary.tile@usds.ca

Gladstone's Mission Impossible becomes Toronto reality

They said it couldn't be done.

"Too ambitious."

"Too expensive."

"It'll never work. Maybe in New York or L.A., but not in Toronto. The city just isn't ready for it."

Good thing principal Raphy Amar and general manager Gino Falcitelli are bad listeners. Today, Gladstone's Glatt Kosher Restaurant is living testimony to the fact that what couldn't be done not only was done, but has enjoyed the kind of success that even its founders couldn't have envisioned — let alone the naysayers who foresaw only impediments.

Another Kosher restaurant, in and of itself, isn't new. What is new is a Kosher restaurant built on a grand scale, with the kind of international cuisine, wine list, beverage menu, and dessert selection that befit world-class dining establishments of the kind previously associated primarily with major American cities.

In Toronto's galaxy of fine dining establishments, Gladstone's star shines brightest

To accomplish such a feat — to open a two-level, 6,000 st. ft. Kosher restaurant in Toronto's most upscale midtown neighbourhood — required a combination of creativity, careful planning, and culinary excellence, together with a healthy dose of chutzpah.

From the grand entranceway to the sprawling main dining room, Gladstone's breathes sumptuous elegance from every pore. The main level is flanked on the west side by a redwood fireplace, lounge and majestic grand piano; on the east by an elliptical backlit bar. The mezzanine level, accessed by a spiral staircase, offers similarly elegant dining in a more intimate atmosphere, complete with private rooms.

Amid such entrapments, it's easy to forget that you're in a restaurant; but once you've tucked in your napkin, the Gladstone's experience begins in earnest.

Puree of Butternut Squash goes down soft and wonderfully smooth; the Palm Springs Salad is a zesty spark to the palate. The Black Angus Steak (16 oz. Park Avenue Cut) is so out of this world that, I'm ashamed to say, my partner has to remind me that couples occasionally talk during meals.

With that timely message duly registered, I'm able to avoid succumbing to oblivious abandon when my tiramisu arrives; it ranks with the finest I've ever tasted.

In bringing Gladstone's to life, Amar and Falcitelli were in agreement that "the time had come to take Kosher dining in Toronto to the next level ... a restaurant that stands on its own merits. World class dining where the food just happens to be Kosher." Continues Amar, "just being Kosher isn't enough anymore. Whether it's Sunday brunch with the kids or celebrating a special occasion, people want to be able to celebrate in style. There's no reason why eating Kosher should mean having to compromise on menu choices or dining environment. If you live in New York, Chicago or L.A., you don't have to compromise. Now, neither do we."

Just don't forget to address your partner lovingly while you're lavishing attention on your steak...

Cross-cultural collaborative orchestra promotes Arab-Israeli understanding

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The sounds of music they create are moving and captivating, but perhaps their most powerful sounds of all are the colossal "lessons in harmony" they engender.

The West-Eastern Divan Orchestra is a group of young Israeli and Arab musicians who live and perform together, tuning out the barriers of conflict while tuning into the concept of understanding the "other."

"It is very important to do away with the ignorance of the other, to understand the legitimacy and point of view of the other," said Daniel Barenboim, the orchestra's visionary and maestro.

It is that mantra of battling ignorance and cultivating understanding that prompted Barenboim, a world-renowned Argentine/Israeli conductor and pianist, and the late Palestinian writer/academic Edward Said to collaboratively envision the idea of this cross-cultural orchestra.

Starting off with a summer workshop for young Israeli and Arab musicians in Weimar, Germany, in 1999, the project has blossomed, now boasting anywhere from 75 to 100 musicians from the ages of 14 to 25, hailing from such places as Syria, Tunisia, Jordan and Israel.

They now meet annually for summer workshops in Seville, Spain, tour the world and recently celebrated the release of a CD/DVD combination, featuring the music of Tchaikovsky, Verdi and Sibelius and a groundbreaking documentary titled Lessons in Harmony.

The documentary tracks the evolution of the endeavour, including music rehearsals, reflections on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and an in-depth conversation between Said and Barenboim.

Barenboim with the West-Eastern Divan Orchestra.

"It was important for me to get to know people from other countries I have no access to," reflected orchestra member Shai Wosner in an interview on the DVD.

"It's... important to hear the opinions of individual people... and not just the government."

Sharing such opinions, Barenboim believes, has likely changed the lives of the orchestra members.

"For most of them, this is their first opportunity to meet the other and to hear the narrative of the other," he said.

"It has changed their lives because most of the things they heard from each other are not things they could have imagined."

To that end, Barenboim pointed out that both Israeli and Arab musicians may have had preconceived notions of the other prior to this experience and through dialogue, they not only have a better understanding of the other side, but have also grown to like and respect each other.

That being said, there have been moments of contention over the years.

For instance, in one scene on the DVD, a friendly conversation between Israeli musician Ilya Isakovich and Lebanese musician Claude Chaloub turns strained when Isakovich briefly mentions his army service.

"Please can you stop," Chaloub pleads.

"I cannot participate if you say something about the army. Nothing about that."

Barenboim does not shy away from these awkward encounters and encourages the musicians to be frank in their discussions.

"We always discuss [the Israeli army]," he said.

"There was never anything dramatic of course, but what this is all about is not just affection."

Alongside the orchestra, Barenboim and Said sought to build cultural ties in other forums by establishing a foundation to pursue that goal.

Included among the achievements of the foundation are the establishment of the Palestinian Youth Orchestra and a musical kindergarten, as well as the performance of a number of concerts.

While there have been many high notes for the orchestra, this past August was particularly triumphant as the musicians played a concert in Ramallah, just days after Israel's withdrawal from Gaza.

The Ramallah concert will be released on CD and DVD.

"The concert in Ramallah was a historical event," Barenboim said.

"The fact it took place was a great step and tremendously helpful. I think we'll continue doing that. We'll have to see how the political situation will develop."

Perhaps if the politicians start to speak in the same language as the orchestra members, more events like the concert at Ramallah will be possible.

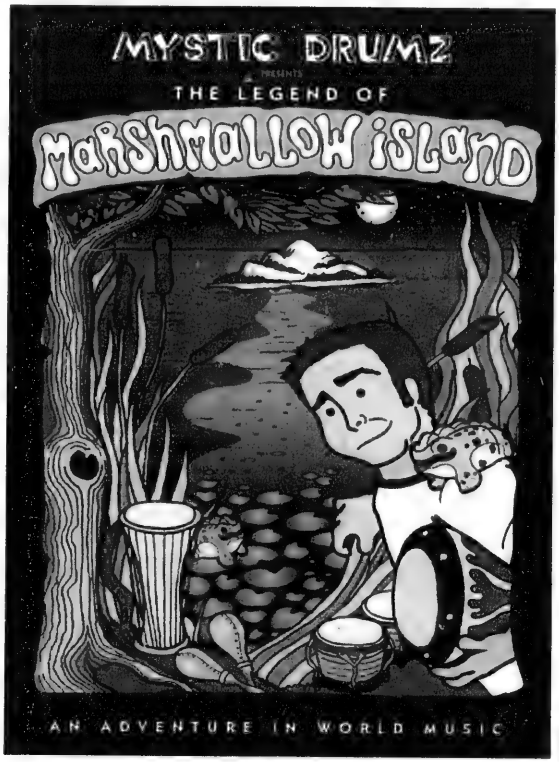
Children's show features music from around the world

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter



A show that promises to engage the imagination and curiosity of children by combining the art of storytelling and the appeal of live music is making its way to a Toronto high school gymnasium next week.

Lorne Lampert, the founder of Mystic Drumz, a "world-music percussions program," has created an interactive performance called the Legend of Marshmallow Island. It blends musical themes from around the world with a story about a boy on an adventure to track down, well, the legend of Marshmallow Island.

"This show is so important for kids because there is nothing like it out there," Lampert said. "There is just less and less music in our schools."

But Lampert, who has a degree in music education and is a percussionist with a nine-piece band called King Sunshine, has found an entertaining and different way to introduce music and arts to young children.

He said learning about music doesn't have to be stiff and boring as it tended to be in the past, but should expose children to a world of infinite creativity.

At the show scheduled for Dec. 11 at Forest Hill Collegiate Institute in Toronto, people should expect the unexpected, Lampert said.

"The featured instruments are so eclectic and unique they've probably never seen or heard them," he said.

With shakers and percussion instruments from South India, Africa and the Middle East, Lampert hopes the performance will pique the audience's interest in world music.

"The show is about interweaving storytelling with music so that you are fully engaging the imagination of young people in a compelling way," he said.

While the target audience for the show is children as young as three, to 11, Lampert said he's certain parents and teachers will love it, too.

"My hope is that it will give birth to a sense of wonderment in the secret world of music to all the children, while renewing it or restoring it in the adult crowd."

Lampert said Legend of Marshmallow Island is another step forward for Mystic Drumz, the company he has been building for the past 10 years.

He said he's grateful for the chance he was given by camp directors at a Jewish Reform sleepover camp in Mississippi and the Green Acres Day Camp in Toronto to develop his percussion teaching ideas and work with children of all ages.

"These experiences gave me years of hands-on development, something that no school could ever teach."

Lampert said he hopes that the production will become an annual event, with different instruments and themes every year.

For more information or tickets, visit www.marshmallowisland.com or call 1-888-222-6608. Tickets are $12.50 and a portion of the proceeds will go to the Sick Kids Foundation.

Grade 8 student from Associated a 'singing sensation'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jakie Young, Toronto's 13-year-old singing sensation, has released a CD titled Yachad Na'amod – Together We Stand.

A musical prodigy with perfect pitch and a trained soprano voice, Jakie is a Grade 8 student at the Associated Hebrew Schools. He has received rave reviews in Canada, the United States, Europe and Israel,

His versatile repertoire in Yiddish, Hebrew and English includes chazzanut, jazz, Broadway and modern Israeli music.

Together We Stand is arranged by Montreal conductor and composer Stephen Glass. The CD is an upbeat mix of Hebrew and Yiddish melodies, combining traditional and contemporary selections, and also includes original compositions.

The 12 selections on Together We Stand give a new interpretation to favourites such as Mi Chamocha, Ein Kelokeinu, Rachem Na and L'Cha Dodi. Glass wrote Adon Olam, Immigrant Song and Hu Elokeinu.

Jakie began his singing career at age six, with weekly solos on Shabbat at the Beth Torah Synagogue with his father, Cantor David Young. He received the title "junior chazzan" from the synagogue.

He was selected as the child soloist for the Toronto debut performance of Oratorio Terezin, composed by Ruth Fazal. He performed the haunting I Never Saw Another Butterfly during the Oratorio's European tour in 2004 in Prague; Brno, Czech Republic; Bratislava, Slovakia; Vienna, Austria, and in Israel, at the International Gathering of Survivors, to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the liberation in May 2005.

Jakie has performed at the Mann Auditorium in Tel Aviv, the Jerusalem Theatre and the Karmiel Cultural Centre in Karmiel, Israel. He was a guest soloist at a performance of the Great Synagogue Choir in Jerusalem, with Cantor Naftali Herstik.

Jakie has participated in numerous concerts, gatherings and fundraisers throughout Canada and the United States, and has sung at synagogue services in Australia. He is scheduled to perform in a concert in Boca Raton, Fla., in March 2006.

"When I first started singing cantorial concerts in Toronto," says Jakie, "I could never have imagined that I would receive an invitation to sing at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal and work with the legendary Stephen Glass."

He adds that he has learned much musically and technically working with Glass on the CD. "Should I be lucky enough to pursue a career in music, I will never forget the musical grounding and value system that I learned under his tutelage."

Glass says, "From the moment I first met Jakie in March 2005, I was struck by the quality of his voice, his musicality and his professionalism.

"Working with him went beyond the interaction of singer and accompanist – this was about creativity and collaboration. The experience of recording a CD with Jakie was equally rewarding. I think the results are wonderful."

Glass, who was born in London, England, completed his musical studies in London and left the United Kingdom in 1990 to take the position of music director at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal.

He has written music for the National Film Board of Canada and, in 1988, composed and arranged the music for Night of a Lifetime, an extravaganza in celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary that was broadcasted on CBC television.

Syriana, set in the Mideast, is a top-notch thriller

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Stephen Gaghan's Syriana brims with virtually all the mandatory ingredients of an early 21st century top-notch political thriller – foreign intrigue, the spectre of terrorism, the illegal arms trade, a bitter family rivalry in a mythical oil-rich Arab nation, a targeted assassination and a sea-borne suicide attack.

Who could ask for anything more?

Now playing in local theatres, Syriana is set in the Middle East, Europe and the United States and has a running time of 122 minutes. And because so many of its characters speak Arabic, be prepared to wade through a lot of English subtitles.

The film – which stars George Clooney as a jaded American intelligence agent dispatched to Beirut on a dangerous mission and Matt Damon as a cynical Geneva-based energy analyst quick to exploit his son's drowning for economic advantage – addresses some current Mideast issues.

One theme, the fluctuating price of oil – a perennial conversation starter – is fleshed out when two competing U.S. conglomerates merge. The underlying message is that consumers may not necessarily benefit from this cozy arrangement. Christopher Plummer and William Mitchell are exceptionally fine as the chief executive officers whose chicanery knows no bounds.

Another theme in Syriana, based on the memoirs of former CIA operative Robert Baer, turns on the scramble for influence in the Arab world.

The United States and China, an emerging superpower, both covet the oil fields of a Persian Gulf emirate where two ambitious brothers are locked in a vicious power struggle. The first brother favours the status quo. The second, a modernizer, dreams of liberating women from the shackles of Islamic tradition and bringing democracy to his desert kingdom.

There are also passing references to Iran and Hezbollah, but for a change, Israel is completely left out of the picture.

A sub-plot revolves around an embittered Pakistani oil worker who is laid off from his job and turns to radical Islam for succour. An imam brainwashes him in the hope of recruiting him as a suicide bomber.

Clooney, bearded, somewhat paunchy and exceedingly soft-spoken, is Bob Barnes, a world-weary, Farsi-speaking spy who has absolutely no talent for self-promotion, even when coached.

At one point, Barnes fights for his life as a Hezbollah torturer pulls out his nails to extract a vital bit of information. Clooney plays Barnes with imperturbable detachment.

Damon is convincing, too, as is Alexander Siddig, who portrays an Arab prince eager to improve the lives of his people.

Syriana, though murky and meandering in spots, is a bracing movie about an extremely important corner of the world.

Author describes how the Nazis helped create Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Nazi Germany helped lay the physical groundwork for the establishment of the State of Israel.

That's the surprising conclusion derived from Edwin Black's book, The Transfer Agreement: The Dramatic Story of the Pact Between the Third Reich and Jewish Palestine, originally published in 1984. Black's research formed the basis of a lecture by Harold Buchwald, a well-known lawyer, community leader and commentator, on behalf of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada to a small number of people who braved a snowy evening last month to hear him at Winnipeg's Asper Jewish Community Campus.

In 1933, Buchwald said, the leadership of Jewish Palestine entered into a pact with Nazi Germany – the so called "Transfer Agreement" – to permit the emigration of German Jews from Germany to Palestine and the transferring of their funds and assets.

"It is a little-known and little-spoken-of transaction," he said.

Buchwald noted that he first heard of the Transfer Agreement last spring when a friend loaned him Black's book.

"No one I know had heard of it, either the transaction or the book," he said.

Edwin Black is an award-winning investigative reporter and international best-selling author. He is also a child of Holocaust survivors.

Buchwald noted that Germany in the early 1930s was undergoing severe economic hardship exacerbated by a huge debt load caused by reparation payments imposed upon it by the victorious nations at the end of World War I. The National Socialist German Workers Party (the Nazis) openly blamed the Jews of Germany for the country's difficulties.

Attacks on Jews and Jewish businesses and property began immediately after Adolf Hitler became chancellor in early 1933.

News of the brutality and a proposed boycott of Jewish businesses made world headlines.

"Spontaneously, grassroots Jewish groups sprung into action in country after country, publicly calling for a worldwide boycott of German goods and services," Buchwald said.

The anti-German boycott was so effective that the German economy and the Nazi government were soon facing complete collapse. But German Jews strongly opposed the boycott, as they contended it would only make things worse for them.

"Enter the Jewish leadership in Palestine," Buchwald said.

The details are murky, he said, because most of what happened in the early stages was surreptitious and clandestine.

Seeing the effects of the boycott on the German economy, Hitler feared it would continue through the fall and winter.

On the Jewish side, it was suggested that a deal might be made with the Nazis that in exchange for stopping the boycott, Germany would grant exit visas to any Jew who wanted to emigrate to Palestine. As well, it would release the equivalent of 1,000 British pounds to meet British immigration requirements, and, effectively, unlock the emigrating German Jews' frozen assets so that German goods and services could be purchased and sent to Palestine.

The Jewish negotiators, Buchwald said, were Sam Cohen, an international businessman with contacts among senior German officials, and Chaim Arlosoroff, a senior Zionist official in Palestine who was killed soon after by unknown assailants.

Clandestine negotiations between representatives of the Palestine Jewish leadership and the Nazis eventually produced a deal. On Sept. 5, 1933, delegates to the second World Jewish Congress in Geneva reluctantly voted to support the deal.

In the wake of the Transfer Agreement, there was widespread collaboration between Zionist leaders and the Third Reich, Buchwald quoted Black as saying.

Both saw emigration and asset transfers to Palestine as part of the solution to Germany's "Jewish problem." Indeed, until 1938, the Zionist movement flourished in Germany under Hitler. It seemed that the Nazis hated Jews, but loved Zionists, Buchwald said.

They expedited the emigration of German Jews and the transfer of funds to Palestine, and they co-operated with the Haganah, an underground Zionist militia in Palestine.

After personally considering the issue in 1938, Hitler, himself, decided to continue to support Jewish migration to Palestine more vigorously. The prospect of ridding Germany of its Jews, he is said to have concluded, outweighed the possible dangers of a Jewish state, Buchwald said.

So what were the ultimate benefits of the Transfer Agreement? Between late 1933 and 1941, Buchwald noted, more than $30 million was transferred from Germany to Palestine, and it's estimated another $70 million was realized via corollary German commercial deals and special international banking arrangements, for a total of $100 million.

Some of Israel's major industrial enterprises were founded with that money, and vast quantities of materiel were stockpiled.

In the same period, approximately 100 immigrant settlements were established along strategic corridors in the western Galilee, coastal plain and the northern Negev. About 60 of these settlements were established between 1936 and 1940. Most were possible only because Transfer Agreement or related funds flowed to Zionist agencies for land purchase and development.

In 1948, when Israel was born, these settlements roughly formed the borders of the new Jewish state.

But the saving of 70,000 otherwise doomed Jews was the greatest benefit of the Transfer Agreement, Buchwald said.

In addition, German Jews brought their culture with them, Black pointed out.

"German music, art, cafes, philosophy and an interest in antiquities and theatre – the finer things that struggling Palestine had never stopped to develop – were transferred like everything else," he wrote.

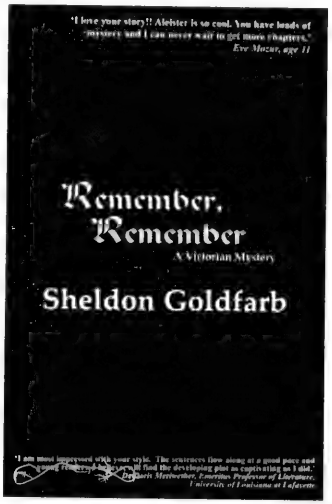
When Vancouver resident Sheldon Goldfarb set out to write his first novel, it was obvious he would chose to set it in Victorian England – after all, he has a PhD in Victorian literature.



"I knew I would be more at home in Victorian England, than in Victorian Canada," he told the Victoria Times Colonist.

The result is Remember, Remember: A Victorian Mystery (UKA Press), a novel aimed at the young adult reader.

It begins in an English public school, a familiar setting for fans of Harry Potter – but without the magic.

Like Harry, though, the hero, 14-year-old Alistair Smith, a bright student, is transported, against his will, out of his secure existence and into a dangerous world of blackmail and murder.

The novel is somewhat reminiscent of the work of popular British children's writer Enid Blyton, in that the heroes are children who outperform the grownups in solving a crime.

Alistair is snatched from his public school by his headmaster's brother, Arthur Talbot, and sent to work in an insurance company. Arthur's motive is that he wants Alistair, a very clever kid, to find out who at the company is blackmailing him.

When the chief suspect is murdered during the bonfire festivities of Guy Fawkes Day, Arthur is arrested. Alistair is forced to use his wits to prove Arthur's innocence.

The novel is set around Guy Fawkes Day, an English holiday that involves bonfires and fireworks, one that might send some North American readers scrambling to Google it.

Goldfarb has a strong sense of Victorian times, and the characters and settings are Dickensian. The era comes alive with women quilting and men discussing Darwinism. The plot moves along smoothly with hardly any distracting subplots. There's also just a hint of romance and teenage jealousies. Young fans of adventure/mystery stories will enjoy this book.

HOLY BLOSSOM'S STAGECRAFT PRESENTS WOMEN'S MINYAN BY NAOMI RAGEN

Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company presents two performances of Women's Minyan, by Naomi Ragen. Set in the Meah Shearim quarter of Jerusalem, the drama focuses on a mother who seeks custody of her 12 children after being denied access by a religious court. The play was originally commissioned by the Habimah National Theatre in Tel Aviv and has been playing continuously to full houses since 2002.

"It's a very poignant portrait of life inside Meah Shearim," said director Michael Ryval. "Ragen exposes the abuse of some women at the hands of their husbands, as well as the initial refusal of their peers to acknowledge that their lives are entirely dictated by men… It's a profoundly moving tale, with tragic dimensions."

The cast includes Susanne Egier, Anna Grosman, Judy Kent, Glenda Mindlin, Jodi Behan, Sarah Grange, Ellen Karabanow, Nora Freund, Viviane Ship and Rhonda Tepper. $15-$10. Holy Blossom Temple, Saturday, Dec. 17, 7:30 p.m. and Sunday, Dec. 18, 2:30 p.m. For tickets, call 416-789-3291, ext. 511.

Sephardi Satire: Sollyloquy, a one-man show by Solly Levy, is a comic lecture on Sephardi Jewish communities that Levy defines as "a social satire but without malice." Levy's evening of music, humour and fun has been enthusiastically received by audiences around the world. $15. Sephardic Kehila Centre, 7026 Bathurst St. (one block north of Steeles). Saturday, Dec. 17, 8 p.m. For tickets, contact Salomon Beldeb, 905-669-7654, ext. 223. E-mail, sbeldeb@kehilacentre.com

Names in the News: Nineteen year-old Laura Silberberg, a second-year music student at the University of Toronto, has won the Amadeus Choir's Chanukah Song Writing Competition for the seventh time for her piece Chanukah Blessings, based on the Hebrew prayer for lighting the candles. Silberberg has performed her own compositions often on CBC Radio and other venues locally and internationally.

In the adult category, Torontonian James Baldwin won for his Chanukah song Ashrei Hagafrur (Blessed is the Match), his first full composition, based on poems by Hannah Szenes and biblical poetry. A baritone, Baldwin has been singing at Holy Blossom Temple for five years. He also sings in the Amadeus Choir, the Elmer Iseler Singers and at the Metropolitan United Church.

TSO Children's Concert: The Toronto Symphony Orchestra marks "Chrismakkah" with two award-winning children's classics. The Polar Express, by Chris Van Allsburg, tells the story of a young boy's magical journey to the north pole, while Elijah's Angels, based on the award-winning story by Michael Rosen, focuses on the relationship between a young Jewish boy and an elderly black woodcarver. The music is conducted by composer Rob Kapilow.

Tickets $17-$55. Roy Thomson Hall, Sunday, Dec. 11, 3 p.m. Pre-concert art activities hosted by the Avenue Road Arts School begin at 2 p.m. 416-593-4828, www.tso.ca

Cal Ripken receives first Koby Mandell Humanitarian Award

By SHERRI MANDELL
Special to The CJN

TEKOAH — When Koby Mandell was in grade school in Silver Spring, Md., the Baltimore Orioles were his favorite baseball team and Cal Ripken Jr. was his favourite player.

When Cal broke Lou Gehrig's record for most consecutive games played (2,130), Koby was eight years old, and although it was close to midnight, he refused to go to sleep until he had watched the entire 22-minute standing ovation.

As we watched Cal on TV, circling the bases, waving at the fans standing and clapping, I thought to myself-what an incredible feeling to have that kind of achievement and adulation. And yet I wondered about the achievement. Cal broke the record basically because he had shown up. I was impressed and yet, I didn't really understand the power of showing up, until I was privileged to spend time with Cal at the first Koby Mandell Humanitarian Award Dinner.

On Nov. 8, more than 500 people joined together in Bethesda, Md., to honour Cal and Koby and to support the work of the Koby Mandell Foundation, which runs therapeutic healing programs for individuals who have lost a family member to terror.

Koby continued following Cal Ripken's career when we moved to Israel in 1996. He tried to follow the games on the Internet. He also continued to collect baseball cards. Any time one of us visited the United States, we brought back cards for Koby. When Koby joined little league in Efrat, he insisted on wearing No. 8 because that was Cal's number. He put a poster of Cal up on his wall. Like Cal, He played shortstop and then third base. The list goes on.

Life wasn't easy for Koby in Israel. It was hard to adjust to a new culture, a new language, and a new home. And because it was hard for him to be accepted as the new kid in class, sports helped him. He could hardly speak Hebrew, but he could kick a soccer ball. For the first year at least, he didn't understand a word the teacher said in class, but he kept showing up.

After Koby was murdered by terrorists at the age of 13, my husband, Seth, spoke in Baltimore and mentioned that Koby was a big Cal Ripken fan. Later that week, the Baltimore Jewish Times printed an article with a headline saying "Cal was Koby's hero."

Cal found out about this through a business colleague and reportedly said, "I was Koby's hero? We have to do something for this boy."

And so, on Nov. 8, four years to the day after Koby's murder, Cal, now retired, made good on his word and accepted the award that honoured them both. If anything could have brought Koby back to this earthly plane, it would have been meeting Cal Ripken – having him autograph balls, sitting with him, talking with him, learning from him.

At the reception before the dinner, Cal said baseball was about putting in the work, the energy and time. (He was renowned for arriving at the field before his teammates so that he could warm up and practise.)

"But after that, when you stand at the plate," he continued, "it's about trusting, about letting go and not forcing anything, relying on the work you've done."

Later I asked him how he stopped himself from getting nervous when thousands of people were clapping and shouting at him.

"It's between you and the ball," he said.

At the start of the dinner, Marla Lerner Tanenbaum, a member of the Koby Mandell Foundation's board of directors and chair of the event, mentioned there had been what she called a "Koby moment" months before the dinner. A Koby moment is a confluence of events that is wonderful and synergistic, something that seems almost too good to be true.

Cal Ripken Jr., centre, with the Mandell family [Photos courtesy Carrie Devorah]

Marla explained that when the graphic artist brought the invitations for the event to the printer in New York, he looked at the invitation, shook his head and said, "You're not going to believe this, but we printed the Cal Ripken 'iron man' Sports Illustrated Commemorative issue and we have photos of Cal Ripken in the back."

He returned with 12 full-size posters of Cal Ripken. "I'm happy to give them to you for such a great cause. Just get me one back autographed."

During the dinner, there was an auction of baseballs, bats and other baseball paraphernalia. Cal put on a No. 8 jersey to auction off. For about 10 minutes, he strutted around the room modelling the jersey. In all, he was on stage for close to an hour doing all he could to help us raise money, even at the risk of looking silly.

And then at the end of the evening, when Cal gave his speech, he said, "You know I've been wearing this No. 8 jersey all night. I was going to take it off right away, because it's a formal dinner and I feel a little goofy wearing it, but then I remembered – No. 8 was Koby's number, and so I kept it on."

He continued: "When my father died six years ago, it was really tough for me. And since then, sometimes I've felt him sitting on my shoulder and whispering things to me. And now when I have those moments, from now on, I'm going to call those Koby moments."

That was my Koby moment – this great man would now be transformed by this evening, and would now define these moments of Godly presence in his life as Koby moments. That was a gift to me. So were the more than 500 people who attended and the thousands of dollars we raised for the foundation.

Breaking baseball's iron man record wasn't just about showing up. It was about being ready, present, able to give everything he could to win a game or make an evening's fund raising event a success. Cal was the first one at the hotel and one of the last to leave that night. He lay on the floor to sign the commemorative photos. Truly being present may look easy, but it's not. Being present is a form of humility, trusting the moment. When we work with survivors of terror, being present is the first step in healing.

Thanks, Koby, for picking Cal as your hero.

Sherri Mandell is Koby Mandell's mother.

A halachic approach to layoffs

Money Matters

Jay Kelman

The massive layoffs announced recently at General Motors have employees at the many businesses connected to the auto industry fearful for their own job security. Especially troubling to many Ontarians is the fact that one of the plants scheduled to be shut down is among the most efficient on the continent.

What are the halachic considerations regarding layoffs?

The first premise of Jewish law is that an employee has no inherent right to employment. Notwithstanding the fact that employers may be making large sums of money due to the efforts of their employees, providing employment for others is the highest form of tzedakah. It is a governmental obligation to provide economic incentives for job creation. There is no obligation for any individual to open a business in order to provide employment to others. Even an existing business may legally wind down its operations, despite the negative impact that may have on the many stakeholders involved. However, such drastic action should only be taken if alternate plans, such as selling the business, are not feasible. And if those affected are in need, all members of society should bear the costs.

Initiating layoffs when executives continue to draw seven-figure (and eight-figure) salaries may create a moral problem, if not a technical violation of Halachah. In many firms, if the top 10 executives took a 20 per cent pay cut – and they could still earn millions – perhaps 200 to 300 jobs could be spared.

It appears that a proper approach to this dilemma is one based on replacement cost. Whatever compensation package would be needed to attract other executives to the firm would be appropriate compensation for current executives, notwithstanding the fact that paying such amounts will lead to layoffs.

When it's determined that layoffs are necessary, employees should be told immediately, thus giving them as much time as possible to find other employment. While employee morale, and perhaps even productivity, will suffer once layoffs are announced, to withhold such information would be a violation of ethical expectations. Jewish law asserts that one must do the utmost not to stand idly by when another person is being negatively affected by something. Waiting to give notice until it best suits the employer would violate this principle and cause undue hardship on employees. Furthermore, affected employees would be entitled to appropriate – that is, generous – severance pay. Biblical law insisted that even a slave be granted severance pay "from your flocks, from your threshing floor and from your wine vat." How much more so must an employee "have a share of all the things through which God your Lord has blessed you" (Dvarim 15).

Probably the most difficult issue is determining whom to lay off. In a lengthy responsum, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein seemingly rejects the idea of seniority as the guiding principal, unless such a principle is made explicitly clear to all new employees. Rather, he says, the affected workers are like partners and thus should equally split the work available.

If such an approach is not feasible, Rabbi Feinstein recommends a "shotgun" approach where one worker can demand to "buy or be bought." While he is talking about a case of two employees, the concept could apply to a larger firm. The optimal approach would be to cut everyone's workload so that all can remain employed. (Thus those hated "Rae days," when all provincial workers under former Ontario premier Bob Rae were forced to take a number of unpaid days off each year, seems to be in keeping with Jewish values.)

What is most fascinating is Rabbi Feinstein's contention that it's workers, not management, who decide. This is quite logical, considering that economic circumstances, not worker incompetence, are the cause of the layoffs.

Zucchini & Jalapeno Latkes

2 large baking potatoes
2 medium zucchini
1 small onion
1 jalapeno pepper, seeded
2 eggs, lightly beaten
2/3 cup unsalted matzoh meal or flour
3/4 tsp. each of salt and pepper
Vegetable oil for frying

Peel potatoes, then grate using medium/large holes; squeeze out liquid. Do the same with zucchini; then mix in with potatoes. Coarsely grate in onion. Finely chop pepper (keep hands away from eyes!). Stir in, and add eggs, matzoh meal/flour, salt and pepper.

Heat 1/2 cup oil in frying pan and fry on both sides until browned. If liquid separates out from the latkes when frying, drain off and stir mixture again before loading onto frying pan.

Drain on paper towels. Serves 10 people.

Jews who want to fight

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Recently Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies showed a documentary on anti-Semitism called Ever Again. The film, with a voice-over by Kevin Costner, addressed the rise in anti-Semitism in Europe through alliances formed by fanatical Muslim groups and neo-Nazis.

The movie, produced by Rabbi Marvin Hier, is an important consciousness raiser. It gave the overflow audience in attendance grave concern about the danger of allowing anti-Semitism too spin out of control. Unsettling footage of twisted carnage and broken bodies following international terrorist attacks, frothing imams inciting violence against Jews, and quotes from politicians, students and Jewish leadership on their new insecurities living in places like Brussels and London brought this point home.

Two important statements in Ever Again, however, did give a positive spin on our ability to act, both as Jews and a world community, to battle this ugly movement. One came from France's foreign minister who bravely said that fighting anti-Semitism is not only the battle of the Jewish people but also that of the international community. Harvard law professor and well-known author Allan Dershowitz called upon the worldwide Jewish community to encourage relations with moderate Muslims, adding that most Muslim people are good folk and likely not interested in blood and warfare.

In the foyer after the movie, I spoke to a young couple who seemed unsettled by the scary reality Ever Again addressed. They said they would like to do more than just give money to organizations ensconced in the struggle to eradicate hatred against Jews, Israel and Zionist. They wanted to actively involve themselves in this process at a grassroots level.

Some tangible options, ideas of hope, for those in attendance and every other Jew able to stand up for our dignity and security are:

- In your place of work or neighbourhood, create a committee or group in which members teach one another about their religious and ideological beliefs, thereby embracing our differences and creating a shared humanity.
- Jewish organizations dealing with fighting anti-Semitism need to create similar satellites made up of Jews and non-Jews that, as Dershowitz said, and develop strong ties with moderate Muslims and individuals of any other background, thereby marginalizing the fanatics. This would inevitably strengthen our friendships and marginalize the radical fringe.
- A worldwide network needs to be designed, utilizing e-mail and other creative and progressive forms of communication that would lend support to European and other Jews suffering from anti-Semitism; establish ongoing and creative think-tanks and brainstorming on how to breakdown stereotypes; train our people on techniques in debating and if need be, physical protection; and offer practical, grassroots solutions and include the entire Jewish world in this process.

Jewish community organizations must begin an aggressive strategy to include Jews able to fight anti-Semitism instead of relying on the old model of leaving the job up to a few overworked professionals and volunteers. We cannot simply create fear in the minds of the Jewish people without extending real ideas to our membership on ways and means of utilizing their strengths to obliterate anti-Semitism.

The renowned philosopher and Jewish activist Abraham Heschel criticized the Jewish people of his generation for being inactive in involving themselves in this area when bold activism was called for. We know anti-Semitism exists. Movies like Ever Again reinforce this troublesome and painful reality. Let all of us take its gripping message and enter into the fight with guts and Jewish determination. Simon Wiesenthal's life stood as an example of our ability to achieve a better world on behalf of ourselves, family and the Children of Israel.

MDA set to join Red Cross

New symbol a response to decades of discriminaton

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — Magen David Adom's longstanding effort to join the International Red Cross and Red Crescent movements has proceeded in fits and starts, so it should have come as no surprise that the latest attempt to clear the major barrier to entry didn't go smoothly.

In the end, though, it was a success: Early last Thursday morning in Geneva, Geneva Convention signatory countries adopted a neutral red diamond as an official protective symbol, to go along with the red cross and red crescent. It will also enable states such as Eritrea and Kazakhstan, who have asked to use both traditional emblems together, to use the crystal emblem.

Please see related stories on pages 3, 4

The move paves the way for MDA to gain full membership in the International Red Cross after nearly 60 years of exclusion due to opposition from Arab and Islamic countries.

"We are blessing the result and we are very, very encouraged by the achievement," said Reuven Azar, counsel for political affairs at the Israeli Embassy in Washington, D.C. "We think that it's a humanitarian issue and it should have been resolved 55 years ago. For political reasons, it was prevented, but fortunately we found a way to advance on this."

Arms tunnel uncovered

Israeli troops uncovered a tunnel they suspect was dug by terrorists from the Gaza Strip. It started in northern Gaza and ended at a point near Kibbutz Erez in Israeli territory. Security officials said the tunnel, the first one known to have been dug into Israel since the Gaza withdrawal, was meant to be used by terrorist infiltrators. Israel had received intelligence alerts about the project and asked the Palestinian Authority to act against it, to no avail.

Montrealer wins world Scrabble title

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

It's not as if Adam Logan didn't know he had a real shot. Before winning it all at the recent 2005 World Scrabble Championship in London, England, the Montreal resident had competed five previous times, never finishing better than fourth in six tries.

"What can I say? It was a wonderfully exciting experience, and I was utterly delighted and not a little astonished," Logan, a 30-year-old mathematician, said in an e-mail interview shortly after his decisive victory over Pakorn Nemitrmansuk of Thailand.

"And now, well… realistically I'll never be world champion of anything else."

With the victory, Logan, who was born in Kingston, Ont., and grew up in Ottawa, earned $15,000 (US) and became one of the disproportionately high number of Jewish Scrabble players who excel at this game of forming everyday and obscure words that use letters in unusual combinations and, of course, the holy grail – two blank tiles.

Logan's mother is Jewish and was born in Israel. In 1999, another Jewish player from Montreal, Joel Wapnick, also won the world Scrabble title.

Here are some more statistics: four of the eight world champions so far have been Jewish – Logan, Wapnick, the United Kingdom's Mark Nyman and United States' Joel Sherman.

Gift To Aid Israeli Kids

TORONTO — An anonymous $100,000 donation from Canada will go to psychological and educational programs to help Jewish children relocated from Gaza adjust to new lives in Israel, UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) said last week. More than 40 schools were closed in this past summer's pullout, affecting 3,500 Israeli kids. "Educational intervention, including extracurricular activities and services from social workers and psychologists is required now to prevent potential problems," UIAFC said.

Nazi Analogy Rapped

MONTREAL — Jewish groups last week criticized Transport Minister Jean Lapierre for using a Nazi analogy to describe Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe's comment that his party will make the Liberals "disappear" from Quebec in the Jan. 23 election. Lapierre said Duceppe's remarks, made at a campaign stop, had "a Nazi tone." Comments like Lapierre's tend to "minimize the horror of Nazism," Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber told CBC, adding the analogy was "regrettably inappropriate." Duceppe later apologized, saying he wants the BQ to win every Quebec riding.

WORLD

'Lost Jews' Get Help

BRASILIA — A Jewish education centre opened in Recife, in northern Brazil, for Bnai Anousim, descendants of Jews forced to convert to Catholicism during the Inquisition. Director Rabbi Avraham Amitai said many descendants of such conversos express interest in returning to Judaism. The centre is being run and paid for by Shavei Israel, a group that helps "lost Jews" return.

Article Causes Stir

DUBLIN — An ex-Irish parliamentarian sparked a controversy with an article questioning Israel's right to exist. The Dubliner, a culture and lifestyle magazine, has received more than 2,000 letters attacking Justin Keating's piece, which claims Jews didn't originate in the Land of Israel but rather "occupied some land 2,000 years ago for a historically brief period." The story "crossed the invisible line from being anti-Israel to being anti-Semitic," the Israeli Embassy said.

Free Jewish Schooling?

BOSTON — Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, outgoing chancellor of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary, proposed free Jewish education for every child whose family belongs to a JCC or shul of any denomination. Announcing his "bold entitlement proposal" last week at the end of the Conservative movement's biennial convention in Boston, he said it would fight a growing Jewish attrition rate, and he proposed Jewish federations pay most of the cost, saying their "immense legacy funds… could be earmarked" for the project.

Suit Targets Dichter

NEW YORK — Two pro-Palestinian groups are suing an ex-head of of Israel's Shin Bet security service who is now a fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington. The Center for Constitutional Rights and the Palestinian Center for Human Rights filed a class-action lawsuit against Avi Dichter on behalf of families of Palestinians killed or injured in a 2002 Gaza air strike. They allege Dichter provided intelligence to carry out the bombing, which killed Hamas kingpin Salah Shehadeh. Some 15 others also died, and 150 were injured.

Media Watchdog Commends CBC

TORONTO — HonestReporting Canada, a pro-Israel media watchdog, is praising the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for adding a statement that it said provided context to its rebroadcast of the Israeli documentary Checkpoint.

The group said that on Nov. 20, the CBC Newsworld program The Passionate Eye ran the film, which has footage of armed Israelis controlling the movement of unarmed Palestinians, without providing historical, political or military background for checkpoints in the occupied territories.

The non-profit group, which claims 12,000 members, called on the CBC to provide that context when re-broadcasting the film on Nov. 26. It also encouraged its members to contact the CBC and demand the same.

HonestReporting said it received the following reply from a CBC producer: "Although we believe we have an extremely well-informed audience, it's possible that some viewers may not have remembered that the second Intifadah had begun during this period, or that the Oslo peace accord had failed… In an effort to clarify this… we have added a reference to these historic events, as well as the increase in tensions, the suicide bombings and civilian deaths."

CBC ran the following statement at the start of, and during, its Nov. 26 re-broadcast: "Checkpoint was shot between 2001 and 2003, after the beginning of the second intifadah. The Oslo accord peace talks had collapsed. Violence and tension was escalating on both sides, and the number of suicide bombings and civilian casualties was increasing."

Jordanian and McGill worked for MDA solution

We can't exclude Israel if we really believe in the fundamental principles of the movement

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A Jordanian Arab with close ties to Montreal has been playing a key role behind the scenes for the past two years to see that Israel finally becomes a full member of the Red Cross organization.

When he stood for election as chair of the Standing Commission of the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement in December 2003, Mohammed Al-Hadid promised to find a solution acceptable to Magen David Adom (MDA) and the signatory nations of the Geneva Conventions.

The president of the Jordan Red Crescent was also a founding member of McGill University's Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building.

In 1999, the commission, which includes representatives of both national societies and states, agreed on the creation of a third emblem, the Red Crystal. Al-Hadid was a vice-chair at the time. A diplomatic conference scheduled for its adoption in October 2000, however, was indefinitely postponed after the start of the second intifadah the month before.

"The first thing I did after I was elected was to establish a working group on the emblem. I wanted it to remain in everybody's mind and not be forgotten," Al-Hadid said in an interview from Amman two weeks before the conference in Geneva where a majority of countries voted to amend the 1949 conventions.

Al-Hadid's position was clearly at odds with the Arab and Muslim countries, which have been the most resistant to Israel's inclusion. He knew he had to convince the international community that there was a will to co-operate, nevertheless, between the Red Crescent and MDA, if he was to get the third emblem back on the agenda.

In April, he persuaded the presidents of the Palestinian Red Crescent (PRC) and MDA to meet in Amman for talks, along with representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross and the International Federation of the Red Cross and Red Crescent.

"I wanted to show that these societies were concerned only with humanitarian work, and could set aside political disputes," he said.

In June, Al-Hadid went to Washington, D.C., to tell the U.S. State Department that a diplomatic conference to approve the third emblem should be held without delay, and he also asked the Swiss government to use its offices to convene the meeting as soon as possible.

Al-Hadid then visited Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, the Palestinians, and Iran to explain the commission's position to foreign affairs officials, and he communicated with other Arab and Muslim countries. "I told them this is an opportunity not to be missed. We need a partner in Israel. We have a lot to gain from the Israelis and their experience. We need each other; it's a two-way street."

Al-Hadid added, "Israel has a right to its national society. We can't exclude Israel if we really believe in the fundamental principles of the movement that there can be no discrimination among people. Any political differences should be addressed in a different forum, not through the humanitarian movement whose goal is universality."

In September, Al-Hadid brought PRC and MDA leaders together in Seoul, South Korea, where they worked on a memorandum of understanding on operational arrangements, specifically in east Jerusalem, which was formally signed in Geneva in November.

"That was the icing on the cake, and the diplomatic conference was then set for Dec. 5 and 6," Al-Hadid said. (The conference was extended by a day after Syria introduced a demand that its Red Crescent be allowed to operate in the Golan Heights.)

The bully must be confronted

From the editor's desk

In the midst of an election campaign in Canada and the run-up to elections in Israel on March 28, newspapers, televisions and Internet blogs are spilling over with election-related news and commentary.

Last week, however, two non-election-related stories were in the news and worthy of specific comment.

• Magen David Adom: As reported elsewhere in the paper, the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies based in Geneva, last week took the historic step of bringing the Magen David Adom within the legally acknowledged ambit of the international rescue and relief agency.

For some six decades, the Magen David Adom was a prohibited symbol for international relief and rescue work. The Muslim countries, as well as some others, prevented the Jewish humanitarian relief symbol from joining the Red Cross and the Red Crescent.

Last week, that finally changed – sort of. By a vote of 98-27, with 10 abstentions, the "crystal compromise" was adopted. The International Red Cross adopted a fourth symbol, a red crystal, shaped like a diamond, in which the Magen David will nestle as a symbol, for use by the Jewish rescue agency outside of Israel.

Of course, the Jewish symbol will be used without restrictions in Israel, but to protect the sensibilities of other countries, mostly, if not all Muslim, the red Jewish star will appear inside the larger red crystal.

To be sure, the decision last week is to be welcomed. It is decidedly good news. It is one more open involvement of the Jewish state and its symbol in the international arena. But it is not unreservedly good news. For the very need to find a compromise still bespeaks the religious and social intransigence of most of the Muslim world on matters concerning the acceptance of Jewish sovereignty in the Middle East.

The editorialist of the Wall Street Journal considered the compromise more a defeat than a victory. "Israeli diplomats are celebrating the crystal as a great victory. If that's a victory, we'd hate to see a defeat. Even this compromise, which was opposed by most Muslim countries, came only after the American Red Cross withheld its contributions to protest Israel's exclusion from the international body."

The Jerusalem Post rejected the appropriateness of any celebration whatsoever, sharply pointing out that the compromise was still institutionalized discrimination.

"Despite these pragmatic considerations, we cannot help but feel deeply offended by both this international verdict and our own nation's puzzlingly obsequious embrace of it," the editorialist wrote. "Why could there not have been four recognized symbols: a cross, crescent, crystal and the Star of David? Or alternatively, why were the cross and crescent not – like our star will be – forced inside the crystal when operating internationally? There are no good answers to these questions. Evidently even a humanitarian movement, and one which perhaps more than any international body purportedly prides itself on neutrality and impartiality, can baldly discriminate against the Jewish state for decades, and then adopt a 'solution' that continues to discriminate against the symbol of the Jewish people.

"By bowing for so long to the utter rejection of the symbol of the Jewish people, and then devising for it a second-class status, the international community legitimized a hatred that is the antithesis of the Red Cross mission and the cause of many of the casualties it treats."

There is no denying that the compromise is further proof, though none is really needed, that the bully is still operating in international arenas. But there is also no denying that more and more countries, agencies, governments and individuals are learning the bitter lesson that, for the sake of decency, civility and survival, ultimately, the bully must be confronted.

• The Bible and archeological evidence: The Saturday Globe and Mail contained an article written by Toronto writer and broadcaster Dan Falk titled "Did spin doctors write the Bible?"

The purpose of the article was to inform readers of the debate among scholars and other interested parties concerning the factual reliability of the narratives of the Jewish Bible.

Falk pointed out there were two contending sides: minimalists and maximalists, as he called them. The minimalists believe only minimally in the historical truth of the events recorded in the Bible; maximalists, obviously, take the opposite view. Both sides, Falk pointed out, turn to different schools of archeological thought to buttress their respective points of view.

Falk implied his own point of view in the debate when he wrote in the introductory paragraphs "Abraham and Moses, it now seems, probably never lived at all."

But he implied more than a point of view, when he wrote: "The story of the Israelites is entrenched: Abraham leads his family to Palestine." (My emphasis.) He implied the possibility of his own agenda.

There is no factual, historical, political, geographical or educational justification for using the term "Palestine" in that sentence. It is simply wrong. That name for the area does not appear before the Romans introduced its precursor some 2,500 years after Abraham.

Canadian Zionists to vote for WZO delegates

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In recent years, prominent Israelis have questioned the continuing relevance of the World Zionist Organization (WZO), the agency founded by Theodore Herzl in 1897.

Yossi Beilin, for one, leader of the Meretz-Yahad Party and a former Labor cabinet minister, has been quoted as saying the organization ought to be disbanded.

In a column in Ha'aretz, Beilin called the WZO "a pathetic vestige of the organization founded by Herzl." He wrote, "It continues to exist as an anachronistic framework, which represents a tiny fraction of the Jewish people."

Norman Stern has read Beilin's critique, and as president of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), the WZO's Canadian wing, he takes issue with it.

The organization remains quite relevant, Stern said, and to demonstrate his point, he cited a personal experience at a passport control booth at Ben Gurion Airport in Israel last October.

Stern was entering the country to attend a meeting of the WZO's board of governors and the guard asked him the purpose of his visit. When Stern gave the reason, the guard said, "You saved my life."

The man had emigrated from Ethiopia and the Jewish Agency, an organization related to the WZO that's funded by Diaspora Jewry, had rescued him from death, Stern recounted.

"I was crying when I left the booth."

The WZO, which is holding elections in 2006 for its Congress, does a lot of good, Stern said. It provides about half the members of the Jewish Agency's board of governors, with Diaspora fundraising organizations providing the other half. The Jewish Agency operates with an annual budget of $350 million (US) and has shlichim (emissaries) around the world. (The CZF "looks after" approximately 200 shlichim in Canada, Stern said.)

The Jewish Agency encourages Jews to move to Israel and assists them in doing so. It also runs educational programs and even operates seniors housing complexes in Israel.

The CZF holds 19 "mandates" (delegates) to the WZO congress, compared to the United States' 165, Stern said. Zionist organizations in Canada can apply to vote and the electors include members of organizations from the Orthodox (Mizrachi), Conservative (Mercaz) and Reform (ARZA) movements, as well as Zionist political parties, including the Canadian affiliates of the Israeli Labor and Likud parties.

While any Canadian Jew can join these groups, Stern estimates about 25,000 are actually eligible to vote. Voters must not only be a member of synagogues or organizations, they must also join the Zionist arms of the groups.

An additional factor in the balloting is the WZO's requirement that 25 per cent of the mandates from any country be people under age 30.

Deadline for this year's vote is Feb. 26, while the deadline to register to vote is Dec. 31.

Stern's response to Beilin's comments – and that of Israeli President Moshe Katsav, who suggested creation of a second Knesset chamber as a forum for Diaspora Jewry to advise the government – was more muted than those of his American colleagues.

In the United States, JTA reported, spokespeople for the American Zionist Movement said the WZO is already doing what Beilin and Katsav have suggested.

Stern said he is open to any ideas that could improve the world Zionist movement. "If it's better for the Jewish people," he said, we should consider it.

But, he continued, the main problem facing the international Zionist organizations is financial. Local federations are allocating less to the Jewish Agency and retaining more for domestic priorities, such as schools. The Jewish Agency's budget dropped by some $20 million (US) from 2005 to 2006, he said.

In Canada, Zionist organizations have a second problem: trying to recruit new members.

"Fewer young people are getting involved," Stern said, and he questioned whether "Israel is not on the agenda of young people as it used to be. I think it's a serious problem."

Part of that is due to the relentless vilification of Israel on campuses, which dissuades many young people from identifying with Zionist organizations, he added.

I was very fortunate to have had the opportunity to attend Associated as a student thanks to the commitment of my parents and financial assistance from UJA Federation and the school. I received an excellent foundation that helped to establish my Jewish identity and responsibility for fellow Jews. This foundation was a significant factor in my decision later in life to pursue a career as a Jewish communal professional at UJA Federation.

My wife Leslie, also an Associated grad, and I decided to send our two children, Shira and Noah, to Associated to give them the same opportunities we had – to learn, experience and explore their Jewish heritage and traditions. We believe that Associated is a great school – pluralistic and accepting with the traditional Torah values that are essential for the continuity of our people.

Iranians deserve the freedom to change, exiled author says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's wrong for North Americans and Europeans to turn a blind eye to human rights abuses in countries like Iran and Saudi Arabia because of a belief that "it is part of their culture," Azar Nafisi said.

Nafisi, the author of Reading Lolita in Tehran: A Memoir in Books and a professor of literature who was expelled from Iran in 1997 after refusing to wear a veil, addressed a capacity crowd at the Holy Blossom Temple recently as part of the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman 2005 Fall Lecture Series.

"It is very condescending when people… think that women in Kabul or in Tehran like to be flogged because it is their culture," Nafisi said.

"It would be like saying burning witches in Salem was their culture… It's like saying that the Inquisition was part of the European culture."

She recalled her feelings about returning to Iran in 1979, in the midst of the Islamic revolution, after having completed her dissertation in the United States.

"As soon as I landed in the Tehran airport, I realized that home is not home," she said.

"I returned home to fundamentalism, terrorism and war in Iran."

She said no state has the right to tell a person how to have a relationship with his or her God, or how to dress, and this should not be ignored by powers of the western world.

Nafisi said she is also offended when westerners refer to countries such as Iran, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia and Turkey as being part of the "Muslim world," even though their cultures have little in common, less than countries like France and Germany, which she says are never referred to as Christian countries.

"We have reduced so many people, millions of people around the world, into one aspect, which is their religion, and then we reduce that religion into one aspect, which is the most extreme, fundamentalism.

"It is like saying all Jews are Orthodox Jews. And even within Orthodox Judaism, they are part of the most extreme sect."

She said it is vital that people begin to see each other as individuals rather than nations and that people must understand that they should not fight individuals, but fight to change the system.

"Every nation in the world has something to be ashamed of, has something that it needs to question. The point is that every nation in the world has the right to change. That is our God-given right."

Nafisi's hour-long lecture, titled "The Power of Democracy in (Secret) Action," was held together by a common theme: that if we don't appreciate the power of imagination and thought, if we don't acknowledge imagination as "the bread and water of the soul," democracy as an ideology will be endangered.

"Political and social democracy cannot exist without the ability to imagine the world. In imagining the world, you are criticizing the present, criticizing the world as it is, constantly questioning," said Nafisi, who, when she lived in Iran, used to meet weekly with seven students to teach them about literature.

"Without imagination we do not have the ability to question the present, and also without imagination, we do not have the ability to look at the world, not as it is, but as it could or as it should be."

Disturbing, dangerous

In October, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad urged that "Israel be wiped off the map." Last week, at a conference in Saudi Arabia, he pronounced a variation on the same theme but also ominously added the grotesque propounding of Holocaust denial.

IRNA, Iran's official news agency, quoted Ahmadinejad as saying: "Some European countries insist on saying that Hitler killed millions of innocent Jews in furnaces… Although we don't accept this claim… If the Europeans are honest they should give some of their provinces in Europe… to the Zionists, and the Zionists can establish their state in Europe." Earlier in the speech he said, "They [the Jews] have no roots in Palestine but they have taken the fate of Palestine in their hands?"

Ahmadinejad's statement is the sneering rant of a religious fanatic who hates the "other." Jewish sovereignty, he repeats, for the benefit of all who thought to dismiss his call-to-genocide in October, has no place in the Middle East. But it is also the stunning, sinister bluster of one who is ignorant of fact and history. Hitler's crimes were a lie, he believes. Moreover, in a disheartening echo of the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's public denial of the existence of a Jewish temple in Jerusalem, Ahmadinejad's summarily severs any connection between the Jewish people and the Land of Israel.

The Iranian president's views are offensive, odious and vile. It is gratifying to note that many Western leaders quickly condemned the remarks. At a news conference near Berlin, German Chancellor Angela Merkel and French President Jacques Chirac both affirmed Israel's membership in the modern family of nations. UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan expressed shock at Ahmadinejad's base attempt at Holocaust denial. Security Council president Emyr Jones Perry of the UK also condemned Ahmadinejad for casting doubt on Hitler's atrocities. Even his Saudi hosts were reportedly angry with the Iranian president for sabotaging the very purpose of the meeting, which was to show Islam's moderate face to the world. Yet, we note despairingly that we found no public condemnations of the Iranian's comments by fellow Muslim leaders.

But woe to the West, not only to Israel, if we dismiss Ahmadinejad's rant as merely the silly stirrings of an uninformed zealot. In light of his country's maniacal campaign to acquire nuclear weapons technology, he and his beliefs are disturbingly dangerous.

"Canada will not tolerate Iran's reprehensible posturing," Prime Minister Paul Martin told the delegates of the United Jewish Communities General Assembly last month. "This threat to Israel is a matter the world cannot ignore. Free nations of the world will not tolerate it," he said.

It is now imperative that Canada join, if not lead, the free nations of the world in loudly rebuking the Iranian president, in bringing him to account and in preventing the Iranian government from developing nuclear weapons.

Sick fascination with body exhibits

I was gladdened to read the article "The ethics of exhibiting human remains," (CJN, Dec. 8) during my research about the many body exhibits touring North America right now. I sit on the board of governors for a natural history museum that wants to feature one of these exhibits.

I feel these exhibits go too far in trying to be "edgy" or "chic," with the main point being to fly in the face of the norm. Most of all, I wonder if every body in each exhibit was obtained legitimately. I am particularly concerned that the bodies from China, made available because they were either unidentified or unclaimed, were prisoners, peasants, patients in hospitals, etc. They have a family somewhere, either wondering what happened to them or thinking they are safely buried with dignity – and surely not naked and skinless on display overseas for the entertainment or education of the masses. I can't imagine discovering that my mother, husband or son was one of those bodies on display. It would be heartbreaking, no matter how interesting people find the exhibit.

I love science, but I have what I think is the very normal concern for other people, particularly those who can't speak for themselves – like the dead. I agree that God demands we treat other people with care, respect and dignity – dead or alive. There is currently a sick fascination with body exhibits. They have far more entertainment and shock value than educational value.

Jews from Muslim countries ignored

In Sheldon Kirshner's story on his recent Toronto speech ("Israeli rabbi addresses human rights abuses," CJN, Dec. 8), Rabbi Arik Ascherman from the Rabbis for Human Rights (RHR), among other self serving statements, declares, "We are not anti-Israel." I conduceted a lengthy correspondence with Rabbi Ascherman wondering whether he would join me in enhancing their campaign for the rights of Palestinian refugees by also recognizing the plight of almost one million Jewish refugees from Muslim countries, many living in Israel. I thought that such a simple and fair idea would appeal to the rabbi and his group, but, unfortunately, for reasons beyond my comprehension, they flatly declined to give any support to their Jewish brethren.

Perhaps Rabbi Ascherman does not think that ignoring the fate of Jews from Muslim countries is a big deal. I respectfully disagree.

Put Jewish monuments at death camps

I am a Holocaust survivor. About 63 years have passed since my dear family, relatives and about six million Jews, including children, were tortured and murdered in Europe.

Since Jewish institutions established Holocaust museums in all major cities of the United States, why haven't they also placed Jewish monuments on the mass graves in the major death camps such Birkenau, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka and Majdanek, where most of the millions were murdered?

A very small portion of the money collected annually from the public on the behalf of the millions of sacred souls would be required to place Jewish monuments on these mass graves.

Unfortunately, Jewish religious organizations and institutions have abandoned the mass graves of the millions of Jews to the "care and concern" of the Polish government.

Perspectives

Obscuring the sacred

Last week, Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, criticized the Body Worlds 2 exhibit currently on display at the Ontario Science Centre. This week, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, offers a different point of view.

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Body Worlds 2, a heavily promoted exhibit now at the Ontario Science Centre, features full human bodies, individual organs, and transparent body slices that have been preserved for viewing. According to publicity for the show, this "offers a once-in-a-lifetime chance to see and understand our own physiology and health and to gain new appreciation and respect for what it means to be human" (my emphasis). I think this claim is false and I want to present what a Torah perspective on Body Worlds 2 might be.

The creator of the exhibit, Dr. Gunther von Hagens, is a native of the former East Germany who developed a procedure he calls "plastination," which replaces bodily fluids and fat with plastic. It's a form of embalming that preserves the inside of a body as well as the outside. His work is on display for the education and entertainment of the general public.

Body Worlds 2 begins with cross-sections of bones and organs. Visitors compare a healthy lung with that of a smoker, a healthy aorta with one full of plaque, a healthy brain with one that has experienced a stroke. It also shows repaired body parts, such as natural and artificial knees and hips. One can see the progression of human development from a seven-week-old fetus to one that is almost full-term. I could immediately understand what smoking does and how cholesterol clogs the arteries, fulfilling the function of emphasizing the importance of a healthy lifestyle. In the comments that people write at the conclusion of the exhibit, one sees that they are deeply affected by the opportunity to see these aspects of the human body.

The main part of the exhibit displays approximately 25 human bodies in various poses – including stretching, walking, skiing, hitting a baseball, skating and cycling. The skin on these bodies is flayed to expose what is inside, so that we can see where in our bodies various organs are positioned, how delicate the nervous and circulatory systems are, and the complexity of the neurological, digestive and body purification systems. One body is cut up as if it were a chest of drawers, exposing different organs through the exposed squares.

Throughout the ages, medical scholars and students have sought to understand how our bodies function through exploration of real human specimens. Body Worlds 2 is intended to help a popular audience better understand the structure and systems inside the human body. On some level, the authenticity of the specimens adds both fascination and horror. It was amazing to be reminded of how complex we all are. I thought of the words of the Psalm: "How great are your works, Eternal."

The exhibit displays a consent form, so that we can see the donors made their donations freely, although I don't know if the donors had ever seen an exhibit before offering their bodies. Perhaps people imagine that this confers a kind of immortality on them. However, as one commentator put it, "it's not for me. The prospect of tourists [examining] my genitals and giggling is more than this mortal flesh can bear."

Specimens of a human and a horse are juxtaposed so as to encourage comparison between two different animals. Other cadavers are "exploded," with one body split and separated, giving the appearance of, say, multiple heads, parallel bodies, or two bodies walking side by side. The result is an image of the body that moves from information to exhibition. I felt as if the intent was to have the body parts cease to be human and to become art, as if the pathologist were the artist. These posed bodies are even signed by von Hagens, as if he had transformed the human body into a sculpture. I had to keep reminding myself that these were not wax dummies, not latex dolls, and not plastic models. These were once living, talking, loving people like us.

While the exhibit wants us to feel awe at the complexity of the human being, it also distances us from the sense that we are viewing real people. The exhibit wants us to see the body as a natural organism. But even as we gain awe, we lose it. The body becomes de-humanized.

The exhibit has another agenda as well. Quotations throughout the exhibit emphasize the mechanistic element of the body. At the entrance is a quote from the German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, "I consist of body and soul in the words of a child… But the enlightened, the knowledgeable would say, I am body through and through, nothing more, and the soul is just a word for something on the body." This perspective sees the person as exclusively a physical entity.

Gottfried Leibniz, the philosopher and mathematician, points to the mechanistic elements of the body: "Each organic body of a living being is a kind of divine machine or natural automaton." We are led to a non-moral definition of good and evil from Epicurus, the ancient thinker: "Get used to the idea that death should not matter to us, for good and evil are based on sensation."

Another Jewish view on exhibiting human remains

In contrast, the Bible offers a different way to understand what being human means. Three times in Genesis, we are told that human beings are created "in the image of God." Rabbi Nahum Sarna, the recently deceased Bible scholar, offered this insight in his Jewish Publication Society commentary to Genesis: "The resemblance… to God bespeaks the infinite worth of a human being and affirms the inviolability of the human person. The killing of any other creature, even wantonly, is not murder. Only a human being may be murdered… The phrase 'in the image of God' conveys something about the nature of the human being as opposed to the animal kingdom… The terminology employed in Genesis is derived from regal vocabulary…. In the Bible … each person bears the stamp of royalty. [This] characterization… furnishes the added dimension of his being the symbol of God's presence on earth… bear[ing] witness to the activity of God in the life of the world. This awareness inevitably entails an awesome responsibility and imposes a code of living."

The cadavers that are displayed in conjunction with the horse and the camel seek to illustrate the ways in which the human body is similar to other animals and how our musculature differs. My teacher, Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, emphasized that while the human "is biologically a type of animal… when pretending to express what is decisive or central about man, these definitions seem to depict an effigy rather than an image of man."

After discussing Aristotle's definition of the human as a "political animal," a "civilized animal," and an "imitative animal," Rabbi Heschel notes that the scholastic philosophers accepted the Greek definition of the human as a "rational animal" and that Benjamin Franklin wrote of the human as a "tool-making animal." Rabbi Heschel, in Who is Man, comments: "There undoubtedly is a conscious desire in man to be animal, 'natural' in the experience of carnality, or even to identify himself as an animal in destiny and essence… To be sure, anatomy and physiology display innumerable points of resemblance between man and animal. Yet, for all the similarity in composition and function, the contrasts are even more remarkable… [Our concern] is not the undeniable fact of his animality but the enigma of what he does, because and in spite of, with and apart from, his animality. If we focus on the animal in human, we gain some biological information, but obscure what we truly need to understand, which is not our animality, but our humanity."

Rabbi Heschel recalls that in modern philosophy, thinkers began to describe the human as a machine, "an ingenious assembly of portable plumbing." He notes that in pre-Nazi Germany, a chemical image was popular: "The human body contains a sufficient amount of fat to make seven cakes of soap, enough iron to make a medium-sized nail, a sufficient amount of phosphorus to equip two thousand match-heads, enough sulphur to rid oneself of fleas." These descriptions of the human being do not express our essential meaning. They actually make it more difficult to gain self-understanding. They mistake the physicality of the human being for being human.

Body Worlds 2 thus obscures and de-sanctifies what is essentially human. Our tradition teaches us that because the human being is in the image of God, even the dead retain sanctity. Key halachic and theological ideas come into consideration when we consider how to treat a dead body. We are prohibited from cutting or abusing the dead (nivul hamet). We are prohibited from preventing or delaying the dead from burial (linat hamet). Except for organ donation, we are prohibited from gaining any personal benefit from the dead (hana'at hamet). All of these prohibitions were instituted to protect and maintain a sense of the dignity of the dead (kavod hamet).

The Torah tells us that one must not impale an executed criminal overnight. Even a criminal is to be treated with respect. Rashi helps us to understand why kavod hamet, honour for the dead, is such a significant value: "The human is formed in the image of the Maker… If one sees the dead body hanging, that person will say, 'The King is impaled.'" Physical features are not the totality of a person. They point to something beyond us, challenging us to reflect the divine image in each of us, to be godly in our actions on earth.

Body Worlds 2 wants us to see physical identity as the totality of a human being. The Torah wants us to see a body as pointing humanity toward the image of God. If you go to the exhibit, walk carefully. Think about what you are seeing. Remember that these cadavers were people like you and me. Remember that the human being is not just physical. Remember that the body is just the beginning of being human. Do not allow the physical to obscure the sacred.

Opinions

The truth about life's tests

A "test," an ordeal that tests our character, is a time when greatness can be achieved. Because of this, tests are spoken of in reverential tones, as if it were a joy to be tested.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

However, it's dishonest to extol tests. Humans hate suffering. The Talmud has a section extolling the righteous man who suffers. But right afterward, it cites three stories of rabbis who are suffering, and each one, when given the choice, says, "I want neither the suffering, nor the reward".

Thus, the Talmud's romantic portrayal of the noble, pious man who accepts his suffering is brought down to earth when noble, pious men refuse to accept suffering. No matter what the reward, even the righteous prefer to steer clear of tests.

Equally dishonest is contemporary society's view of tests. Today, we are firm believers in the shallow clichés of the bookstore's self-help aisle. After any ordeal, we're told to seek "closure." With a few quick rituals, we can "move on" and forget our pain. Indeed, today only one test matters: whether or not a person is able to "move on" after a trauma.

This ignores human reality. I find it upsetting when people try to dispense advice to mourners about how they can "get over" their grief. This advice adds insult to injury. Not only is the mourner in pain, it's also his fault he hasn't figured out how to "get over it." But the reason the mourner can't "get over it" is because ordeals are not mere inconveniences. They are critical life experiences.

This is why we have a custom to treat a yahrzeit, the yearly anniversary of a relative's death, as a day of partial mourning. It's an eloquent way of saying that we still mourn, and the person is still sorely missed. By refusing closure, we show genuine respect both for the experience of love and for those we have lost.

A true test is too painful to romanticize, too difficult to "get over."

Tests are genuine traumas. Yet, despite the pain, people can transcend their circumstances, and even utilize pain to achieve remarkable heights.

I recently read an article in The Atlantic about the legendary U.S. president Abraham Lincoln. It described Lincoln's lifelong depression, which at times gave him suicidal impulses. Remarkably, his depression drove him to engage life more deeply, and to find a transcendent sense of meaning. Lincoln's greatness was built, in large part, on his struggles with depression.

This is a paradigm of how to engage the tests we face in life. There is no true closure after trauma. The pain remains, no matter what we do.

Our best choice is to reach for transcendence by suffering meaningfully, and enlisting our pain in the service of higher ideals.

This is no time for ecumenical pleasantries

After yet another recent Hezbollah attack on Israel's northern border, I wrote a Montreal Gazette opinion piece called "Terrorists in suits and ties." Worried that Western politicians are ignoring the exterminationist agenda and brutality of Hezbollah in Lebanon and of Palestinian terrorists such as Hamas, I pleaded: don't be swayed by Hezbollah's seemingly civilized presence in Lebanon's Parliament or Hamas' social service arm and electoral goals. Terrorism is always political. "Terrorism is violence with a political agenda. Without the political context, bombing, kidnapping, and shooting are simply crimes."

Gil Troy in Montreal

Predictably, pouncing on Israel's pre-1948 struggles, some Zionist friends on the left echoed anti-Zionist critics, saying: "What about Likud, Menachem Begin, Yitzhak Shamir?"

Rather than giving the usual Irgun Alumni Association answer justifying the Jews' tactics, which indeed mostly sought military targets, I would label the comparison obscene. It reflects an outrageous absence of proportionality. The violence that some Palestinian Jews resorted to was limited, and wrapped in ambiguity, ambivalence, and apologetics. Meanwhile, Hezbollah and Palestinian terrorists for decades have launched multiple, vicious attacks targeting innocents – all rationalized by a dehumanizing ideology that demonizes their enemies and calls for the annihilation of Israel, and often, the Jews, the United States and the West, too. And in running for office, these terrorist politicians remain committed to their ideology, feeling vindicated if they win.

Let the metaphysicians and psycho-pathologists explain why so many of Israel's critics, and particularly, so many Jews, have this broken barometer, this inability to distinguish the minor from the major, the incidental from the purposeful, the occasional from the systematic, as long as it indicts Israel, America or the West. What mystifies me is this blindness despite a sustained, bloodthirsty attack on Israel, the Jewish people, liberalism, and the West.

"Our struggle against the Jews is very great and very serious," the Hamas charter states. After quoting the Qur'an saying Muslims must "fight the Jews," the charter proclaims: "There is no solution for the Palestine question except through jihad [holy war]. Initiatives, proposals and international conferences are all a waste of time and vain endeavours." The "Party of God," Hezbollah, makes equally sweeping, sadistic charter claims that target Israel and America.

For those who have somehow overlooked jihadism's lethal nature, Dr. Andrew Bostom, an associate professor of medicine at Rhode Island Hospital, has a lengthy prescription. Bostom's 759-page volume, The Legacy of Jihad: Islamic Holy War and the Fate of Non-Muslims (Prometheus Books, 2005), could be called Everything Westerners Need to Know about Jihad – But are Afraid to Ask.

Often letting the jihadists' ferocious words speak for themselves, the book chronicles 13 centuries' worth of Islamic attempts to conquer and slaughter non-Muslims. The scholarly articles and original documents – some published in English for the first time – debunk the popular ahistorical, superficial explanations for the current Islamicist terror wave. Labelling this phenomenon new, or a response to anything Israel has done, or a reaction to indignities that modern Muslims endure, makes as much sense as attributing modern American democracy to contemporary prosperity without mentioning the American Revolution.

No, not all Muslims are jihadists, but all jihadists are Muslim. And not all jihadists are similar or unified – making connections should not entail ignoring distinctions. Still, this deep-rooted Muslim phenomenon cannot be wished away with ecumenical pleasantries. Viewing jihadism through some politically correct rose-coloured lens is as sloppy and condescending as considering all Muslims terrorists. All religions have their extremists. Fanaticism ebbs and flows. The question is how mainstream and mobilized are the zealots. These days, Islamic jihadist fanaticism is at a high, lethal tide, menacing Muslim moderates and jihadist targets alike.

Recognizing jihad's centrality should not lead to demonizing Muslims or Islam. Rather, it recognizes the daunting challenge facing the Western world – as well as the gutsy Muslims committed to liberalism, enlightenment, and progress.

One such hero, forced to use the pseudonym Ibn Warraq, introduces Bostom's invaluable volume. He wonders "why did it take a nonspecialist such as Dr. Bostom, a scholar from another discipline – clinical epidemiology… to discover," translate and publish some of "this primary and secondary source material?"

Clearly, this problem of the broken barometer, of cockeyed analysts unable to assess good and evil in proportion, is not simply a Jewish phenomenon but a Western one.

Chanukah - no matter how you spell it

How do you spell Chanukah? Does it begin with "H" or "Ch?" Or perhaps with the diacritical marking of H with a dot under it, the convention for representing the eighth letter of the Hebrew alphabet in English transliteration. And is there one "K" or two? Should it end in H or A?

Orthographically speaking, Purim is easier. For one thing, the word contains no sounds that lack an English equivalent. For another, that holiday's name appears in English with far less frequency. In our North American multicultural society, everyone, it seems, has heard of Chanukah, but relatively few know of Purim. Yet, Judaically speaking, they are of equivalent importance – both are minor festivals entailing few prohibitions, and both celebrate rescue from the brink of disaster.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Chanukah's contemporary prominence, of course, is due to its proximity to Christmas. This year, in fact, we light the first candle on Dec. 25. Chanukah has been pumped up for several reasons. Some Jewish parents fear their children may feel left out in the cold as their Christian cohorts open gaily wrapped bundles under the tree. More significantly, the forces of commerce can't resist a potential market: cards, gifts, parties. Historically, this consumerism has little to do with our festival.

The difficulty with spelling Chanukah – a difficulty of transliteration from Hebrew to English – is part of a larger challenge, that of translating cultures. As members of a diverse, shared civic space, we North American Jews interpret our culture for the benefit of our fellow citizens. We find ways to explain the significance of our holidays that will seem meaningful to others. We also interpret our tradition for our own benefit.

As Jews move through time, Jewish texts and Jewish memory give us a framework for understanding ongoing events. At the same time, current issues and thinking reframe the way we view our past, our texts, our traditions. Inevitably, we see history through the lens of the present, and interpret our rituals through the prism of our own lives. What do we see in Chanukah? That depends on who is doing the interpreting.

Recently, I trolled the Internet and pored over Jewish newsletters to see how my contemporaries explain the relevance of Chanukah.

A brief sampling: the Maccabees are freedom fighters – their risky self-determination demonstrates the value of standing up against oppression, no matter the odds. Or, the rejection of Hellenistic values exemplifies the imperative to stand up for our religious beliefs and practices against external influence, idolatrous practices and false faiths.

Or, the Greek forces symbolize persistent religious persecution that Jews endure. Or, in the might and determination of their small fighting force, the Hasmoneans are the spiritual ancestors of the defence forces of the Yishuv and of Israel. Or, the light of the chanukiyah represents spiritual enlightenment, or overcoming the darkness of evil, history, materialism and despair.

Some people might consider this proliferation of interpretations to be a dilution of Jewish learning and authenticity. I disagree. To the contrary, the multiplicity of meanings shows a real engagement with Judaism, a desire not to compartmentalize our rituals, but to bring them into the scope of our lives. I see it as an intensification of Judaism, a move beyond the culinary, because it is a way of thinking seriously about how Jewish learning and commitments are in dialogue with important issues.

After all, the story of Chanukah centres on two miracles: the triumph of the Maccabean forces and the kindling of the menorah in the Temple for eight days. While different, both miracles entail comparative size: small and large. A small number of fighters overcome a larger force; a small amount of oil performs the work of a larger amount. When interpreters focus on the first miracle, they tend to emphasize the overcoming of oppression, hardship and persecution. When they focus on the second miracle, the oil, they tend to focus on spirituality, continuity and transcendence.

The two aspects, of course are intertwined, and both are valid. I'm not pushing any single meaning for the holiday. But I admit, this year, to a slight preference for the miracle of the oil, a celebration of spirit. All too often, we focus on our fears. Now, in the darkness of winter, let's focus on light, on reflection and celebration. The best way to transmit our tradition to future generations is to demonstrate its meaningfulness to us, and to rejoice in it the fullness of our days.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books

If you're thinking of Chanukah gifts, think books. These eclectic books, hot off the press, may be of some interest.

Herbert Sonnenfeld, a German Jew, visited Palestine in 1933 after losing his job. He took photographs of Jewish refugees and published them in a Zionist newspaper in Berlin, thereby launching a career in photojournalism. When he left Germany, he and his wife, Leni, immigrated to the United States. From their base there, they spent many years snapping photos of far-flung Jewish communities. Their sharp, humane, poignant portfolio has been assembled in Eyes of Memory (Yale University Press), a marvellous album with a foreword by James Young.

U.S. army psychiatrist Dr. Leon Goldensohn was assigned the task of monitoring the mental health of German Nazis, such as Hermann Goering and Hans Frank, who had been charged with genocide. The transcripts of his chilling interviews have been transcribed and edited by historian Robert Gellately in Nuremberg Interviews (Alfred A. Knopf), a compelling volume.

The myriad ways in which Adolf Hitler's regime reshaped Germany and rendered Jews pariahs is the subject of Richard J. Evans' excellent The Third Reich in Power (The Penguin Press). Eric A. Johnson's and Karl-Heinz Reuband's oral history of everyday life under the Nazis, as seen through the eyes of Jews and non-Jews, What We Knew (HarperCollins), is also powerful stuff. So is Christiane Kohl's The Maiden and the Jew (Random House), a Greek tragedy turning on the ill-fated friendship between a German woman and her Jewish landlord during the Nazi period. Hitler Youth (Harvard University Press), by Canadian historian Michael H. Kater, recounts with exacting precision how the Nazis brainwashed a generation of young Germans. A first-rate companion volume, Cruel World (Random House), by Lynn H. Nicholas, explains Germany's treatment of children, Jewish and Christian, who fell under its cruel sway. The Last Eyewitnesses (Northwestern University Press), edited by Jakub Gutenbaum and Agnieska Latala, are the stories of 33 men and women who, as children, hid their Jewish identities to survive in Nazi-occupied Poland.

In Rescued from the Reich (Yale University Press), Bryan Mark Rigg tells the incredible story of how a half-Jewish German officer, in collusion with U.S. officials, saved Joseph Schneersohn, the Lubavitch rebbe, from certain death during the Holocaust. With the publication of Alternatives to Hitler (Princeton University Press), historian Hans Mommsen has written what may be the definitive account of the anti-Nazi resistance movement in Germany, and in What Stalin Knew (Yale University Press), David E. Murphy expertly delves into one of the greatest intelligence mishaps of the war, the Soviet Union's failure to anticipate Germany's 1941 invasion. Auschwitz: A History (HarperCollins), by Sybille Steinbacher, is informative. Ben Shepherd's After Daybreak: The Liberation of Bergen-Belsen, 1945 (Schocken) is a hard-hitting investigation of the causes of the unnecessary deaths of 14,000 camp survivors.

Ken Shuldman's Jazz Survivor: The Story of Louis Bannet, Horn Player of Auschwitz (Vallentine Mitchell) is a testament to the resiliency of the human spirit. In stark, evocative prose, Israeli novelist and Holocaust survivor Aharon Appelfeld remembers his bitter-sweet adolescence in The Story of a Life (Random House).

Jews do not speak with one voice about Israel, as you will notice when reading the essays in Prophets Outcast: A Century of Dissident Jewish Writing about Zionism and Israel (Nation Books), edited by Adam Shatz. Two Stars for Peace (iUniverse), by Martine Rothblatt, is extremely unusual. In an outside-the-box proposal to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict, she proposes a plan whereby Israel and Palestine would become the 51st and 52nd states of the United States. Unorthodox, if nothing else. In Company C: An American's Life as a Citizen-Soldier in Israel (Douglas & McIntyre), Haim Watzman, a religious Jew, skillfully recalls the pleasures of fellowship and the imperatives of duty during his 18 years as a grunt in the Israeli army.

In The Secret History of the Iraq War (HarperCollins), Yossef Bodansky purports to lay bare the real story of the 2003 allied invasion. His revelations stagger the imagination, but are they really true? The Connection (HarperCollins), by Stephen F. Hayes, claims that Saddam Hussein's relationship with Al Qaeda was far closer than we commonly think. In Terror in the Name of God (HarperCollins), Jessica Stern minutely examines what drives jihadist terrorists from Pakistan to the Gaza Strip. And in Knowing the Enemy: Jihadist Ideology and the War on Terror (Yale University Press), Mary Habeck plumbs the beliefs of the radical Muslim terrorists who wreaked death and destruction on the United States on Sept. 11, 2001. In Aftershock (Dundurn), Canadian refugee and human rights lawyer David Matas skillfully argues that the delegitimization of Israel inevitably leads to the demonization of Jews.

The Guggenheims (HarperCollins), by Irwin and Debi Unger, is an absorbing portrait of a fabulously wealthy Jewish American family that has left an indelible mark on business, philanthropy and the arts. Tony Michels, in a remarkably thorough volume titled A Fire in Their Hearts (Harvard University Press), examines the Jewish/Yiddish socialist scene in New York City from the 1880s to the 1920s. Born to Kvetch (St. Martin's Press), by Torontonian Michael Wex, offers an incisive, amusing, erudite analysis of Yiddish and its relationship with, among other topics, angst, food and sex. Bar Mitzvah Disco (Random House), compiled by Roger Bennett, Jules Shell and Nick Kroll, confirms yet again that the religious rite of passage has been tarnished in America by runaway materialism. This lavishly illustrated, sardonic social history is a snapshot of Jewish culture in the 20th century.

Oxford University Press is owed a round of thanks for having the foresight to publish a most useful series of concise primers on Judaism, Islam, the Koran, the Crusades, fascism, Karl Marx and terrorism. These slim volumes are great reference works.

If you're in the market for books about Judaism and Kabbalah, you're in luck. To Heal a Fractured World (Schocken), by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of Britain, resonates with knowledge and wisdom. Joseph Dan's Kabbalah: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford University Press) probes the undercurrents of Jewish mysticism, while Rabbi Abner Weiss' Connections to God: Ancient Kabbalah and Modern Psychology (Random House) recommends ways to achieve spiritual growth. In Maimonides (Schocken), Sherwin Nuland paints a full-bodied picture of a seminal Jewish philosopher. What Do You Mean, You Can't Eat In My Home? (Schocken) is Azriella Jaffe's take on problems faced by newly observant Jews.

Food & Judaism (Creighton University Press), edited by Leonard J. Greenspoon, Ronald A. Simkins and Gerald Shapiro, presents a wide range of research on the history of Jewish food practices. Jewish Holiday Feasts (Raincoast), by Louise Fiszer and Jeannette Ferrary, are full of favourite recipes. In Secrets for Permanent Weight Loss (Whitecap), Rose Reisman rolls out 150 lower-calorie recipes designed to keep you healthy and happy. And in Jeff Nathan's Family Suppers (Random House), kosher cuisine is king. Ghillie Basan's The Middle Eastern Kitchen (Raincoast) shmecks of exotic fragrances and lore, and May Bsisu's The Arab Table (William Morrow) is a garden of delights.

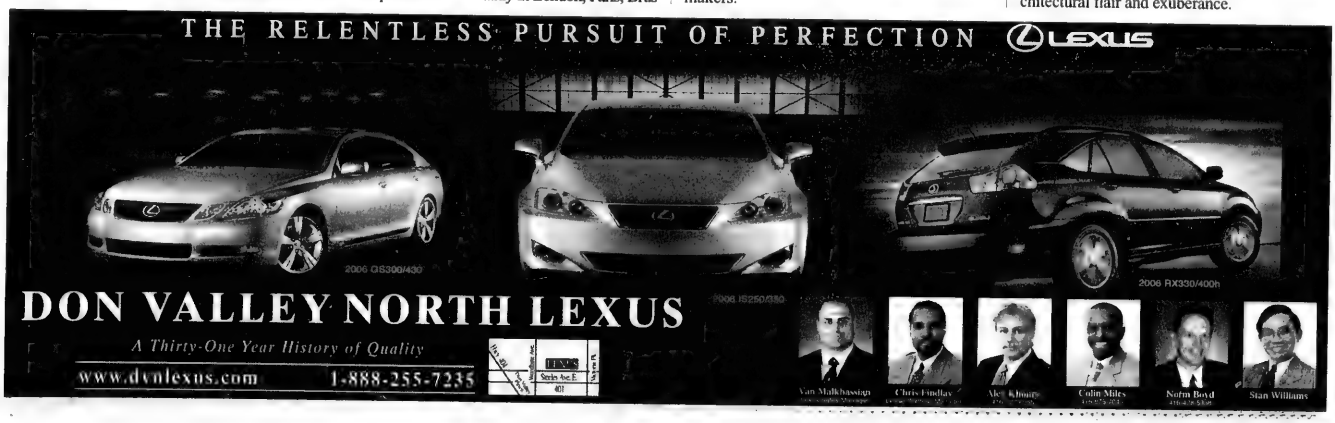
In general: Movie fans will appreciate Ephraim Katz's fifth edition of The Film Encyclopedia (HarperCollins), the last word on the subject. Grand Landscapes of Canada (Firefly), by photographer J.A. Kraulis, is stunning in its beauty. Coach Houses of Toronto (The Boston Mills Press), by Margo Salnek and Donna Griffith, is a tribute in words and photographs to architectural flair and exuberance.

A never-ending battle

For about the past five years, since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising and the 9/11 terrorist attacks in the United States, we have witnessed a resurgence of violent anti-Semitism in Europe and the emergence of an anti-Jewish brand of extreme Islam whose association with the radical left and even neo-Nazis raises disturbing questions. Ever Again, a timely new documentary from the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Moriah film division, examines this toxic mix of developments and the growing trend in some intellectual circles to question Israel's very legitimacy. It is directed by Richard Trank and narrated by Kevin Costner.

Ever Again, which had its Canadian premiere in Toronto recently, is a clever word play on the oft-repeated phrase "Never again." It focuses on European imams – mainly in London, Paris, Brussels and Amsterdam – who glorify Al Qaeda fugitive Osama bin Laden and demonize Jews in the name of fighting Zionism; on disaffected Muslim youths in France and Britain who have bought into their virulent views; on French Jews who have been victimized by their rage; on neo-Nazi skinheads in Germany who vent their visceral hatred through marches, music and web sites; and on European men of letters, including an Irish poet and a Portuguese Nobel Prize winner, who, in effect, blame Jews for the scourge of anti-Semitism.

Ever Again, buttressed by comments by observers ranging from British parliamentarian Louise Ellman to Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, suggests that the battle against anti-Semitism is a never-ending one. On this crucial point, I fully agree with the filmmakers.



Community celebrates success of Campaign 2006

Campaign closing features David Frum

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

For those dedicated volunteers, canvassers and lay leaders who have been working in the trenches of UJA Federation's Campaign 2006, it hardly seems possible that it is coming to an end.

Yet, that is exactly what the community will come together to celebrate on December 15 at the closing of Campaign 2006 and its great achievement of having already raised close to $50 million towards three strategic commitments:

- social justice: assisting the poor and vulnerable
- rebuilding Israeli lives after five years of terror
- connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life

The Campaign Closing will offer the community a glimpse into the amount of work it takes to mount a campaign, which this year was chaired by Warren Kimel and Honey Sherman. It will also showcase David Frum, renowned author, journalist and political commentator, as the keynote speaker. Now living in Washington D.C., Frum is often in Toronto and a regular contributor to the National Post.

"I see traveling to Toronto as more of a commute than anything else," Frum said during a phone interview before the event. "I'm in Toronto at least once a month and during the summer; it's definitely a second home."

David Frum

While at the UJA Federation Campaign Closing, Frum plans to speak about the Jewish community and political choice. With elections set to take place in Canada, Israel and the political volatility of the United States, he will offer insight into where Jews stand in the political landscape.

"I won't tell people what to think," he explained. "But rather how to think about the safety and well being of the Jewish community worldwide."

Stating that UJA Federation has been a part of his world since he was ten years old, he is pleased to be involved with the Toronto Jewish community.

"Toronto has an especially active and committed Jewish community," he said. "More so than its numbers would suggest. I am really glad to contribute in this way."

USDS set to open on Lebovic Campus for 2008 school year

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and United Synagogue Day School (USDS) have announced that a new branch of USDS will be built on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan by 2008.

The campus - an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign - is located on a 50 acre site at Bathurst & Weldrick (north of Rutherford) that will eventually house schools, community agencies and a new community centre, among other facilities.

The Tomorrow Campaign - chaired by Lawrence Tanenbaum and Gerald Schwartz - is the largest not-for-profit Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history with a goal of raising more than $250 million for three Jewish campuses in the Greater Toronto Area.

Under the terms of the agreement, USDS will construct a school at a location just west of the new Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto high school and the new Schwartz/ Reisman Centre. The school will replace USDS' current location at Bayview and Weldrick, which has been sold.

USDS is planning to be open for classes in September 2008. The agreement provides the opportunity for USDS to share athletic facilities, program rooms, meeting rooms and other amenities in the Schwartz/Reisman Centre.

"The presence of USDS will add immeasurably to the educational atmosphere of the Lebovic campus," said Marshall Kesten, chair of the Lebovic Campus Education Committee. "This campus will be the cornerstone for the next generation of the Jewish community."

"We are thrilled about this development, which will ensure that USDS is among the first Jewish Day Schools on the Lebovic Campus," said USDS President Allen Gales. "This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for USDS that renews our commitment to serve the Jewish community in York Region."

UJA Federation and USDS will strike a Joint Management Committee to oversee planning, fundraising and construction of the new school.

USDS students will be attending class in a new branch of the school on the Lebovic Campus in Vaughan in 2008.

Toronto man pays tribute to fallen hero in Israel

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

To many, the name Buzz Beurling may conjure up images of a movie action star or a comic book hero, but to Toronto's Mendy Sharf, Beurling, a former World War II fighter ace, was a hero in the true sense of the word; a hero neglected by his country far too long.

Born in Verdun, Quebec in 1921, George "Buzz" Beurling acquired legendary status and international notoriety as one of Canada's greatest air aces for shooting down 31 enemy aircraft while serving with the Royal Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF).

Just prior to his death in 1948, Beurling hoped to begin a second career flying fighter planes for Israel and he joined the Israeli Air Force. Unfortunately, when Beurling, along with his friend, an American fighter pilot named Moshe Cohen, took off from Rome's Urbe Airport en route to his new life in Israel, their engine cut out on take-off and both were killed.

While sabotage was suspected, it was never proven.

"I always had a soft spot for Buzz because he volunteered for Israel, and six months ago I read an article about him, and it really hurt me to know he was never treated the way a war hero should be treated," says Sharf, a successful Toronto developer who still remembers hearing about Beurling's untimely death on the radio 57 years ago. Sharf was in RCAF officer training at the University of Toronto at the time.

Sadly, the Canadian government - under Mackenzie King's leadership - wouldn't agree to return Beurling's remains to Canada. Instead, shortly after the establishment of Israel, local Jews in Rome - with the help of an Israeli navy ship - brought Beurling's remains to Israel. Since then, the Presbyterian Beurling has been buried in a military cemetery in Haifa side by side with Jews and non-Jews who fought for Israel.

Determined to find his hero's final resting place, and with the help of UJA Federation's mission department, Sharf located the site of his hero's grave, and immediately planned a sojourn in order to pay his respects.

Mendy Sharf at the Haifa gravesite of Buzz Beurling.

"When I heard Buzz was buried in Haifa, I called Aviva Malka at UJA Federation and within 24 hours, she sent me maps and information about the military cemetery," says Sharf. "Once I saw the map, I decided - as a former air force guy - that this national hero, and hero of Israel, must be shown some appreciation and respect."

As quickly as UJA Federation could put together an itinerary to make his goal a reality, Sharf, along with his step-daughter Debra Thuet, touched down at Tel Aviv's Ben Gurion Airport, where, along with an Israeli guide, they immediately made their way to Beurling's grave.

"I ordered a big wreath in his memory, which I laid on his grave after saluting him," says Sharf. "I'm so glad that we did this; it was incumbent on me to pay my respects to this man who gave his life for us, for the freedoms we enjoy today. When I return to Israel with my children and grandchildren, we'll all go and pay our respects to this incredible man. I'd also suggest that anyone who is planning a trip to Israel should make the trip to Haifa and pay respect to not only Buzz Beurling, but to all of our fallen heroes - Jews and gentiles alike - who gave their lives for Israel."

UJA Federation revenues top $93 million

New revenue streams expand financial resources beyond record annual campaign

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

As the Jewish population of the Greater Toronto Area continues to expand and the community continues to flourish, so, too, does the width and breadth of UJA Federation. The latest financial figures attest to the record growth of what today has become a rapidly changing Federation.

At a recent UJA Federation Board of Directors meeting held at the Lipa Green Building, the annual financial statements were brought for approval, all of which highlighted the changing face of the organization.

"There is quite simply much more to UJA Federation today than our Annual Campaign, although that's where our roots will always remain," says Ted Sokolsky, president of the organization. "While the annual campaign continues - year after year - to be the powerhouse engine that drives the entire system and allows us to expand our borders into so many other areas, there's much more to the new UJA Federation."

Sokolsky points to a number of initiatives which illustrate the ever-expanding role of UJA Federation and its ongoing maturation, including an increase in corporate sponsorship, the exciting growth of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto and the ambitious Tomorrow Campaign.

"The Foundation has been growing tremendously over the last couple of years," says its director, Carol Kassel. "We're fortunate to have a team of wonderful lay people - professionals who guide the policies of the Foundation and the investment committee. In fact, last year they managed the Foundation's investments to an impressive return of more than 13 per cent."

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto has increased its assets from $21.2 million in 1994 to almost $130 million today.

The Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum, is the largest not-for-profit Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history with a goal of raising more than $250 million for three Jewish campuses in the GTA.

"The Tomorrow Campaign is all about the renaissance of Jewish Toronto's cultural and communal infrastructure," says Carol Seidman, director, UJA Federation Capital Campaign. "It's about building a great city that will continue to flourish not only today, but for generations to come. Fortunately, donors to the Tomorrow Campaign are visionaries, all of whom want the very best for the future of Jewish Toronto."

The Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan is an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign.

The $93 million total for the 2004/2005 fiscal year, which includes approximately $55 million from the annual UJA Federation Campaign (third largest in North America behind only New York and Chicago) and over $38 million mainly from new revenue streams are just a glimpse of things to come, says Federation Board chair David Engel.

"As our Tomorrow Campaign ramps up and endowments within our Foundation expand, the community can expect to see that annual revenue figure grow rapidly over the next few years," says Engel. "In fact, with the addition of these new revenue streams, it's estimated that from 2000 to 2008, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will have raised over one billion dollars in total, making it one of the leading philanthropic organizations in Canada."

Inclusion task force promotes full participation in Jewish life for disabled

When Dayna Blustein was deafened by meningitis at the age of four, her parents were presented with a difficult choice. Should they keep her in Jewish day school, like her two older siblings, or send her to a public school, where she would be provided with the tools and assistance she needs?

Because Dayna has a cochlear implant, she can hear as long as her teacher uses a personal FM system. Public and separate schools provide the FM system for their deaf students, and create an individual education plan for each student outlining their particular needs.

In the end, the Blusteins, day school graduates themselves, decided to send Dayna to United Synagogue Day School (USDS). "We wanted her to have a day school education," says her father, Norman Blustein. That decision meant spending several thousand dollars on a personal FM system and acoustic modifications to the classroom. "We're lucky we can afford it," he says. "Some people can't."

Today, Dayna is in grade five at USDS's Richmond Hill campus. "It's a neat school," she says. "I have lots of friends there. I have a group of really good friends I've been with since grade one." She loves writing stories in English class, but finds it hard to keep up in Hebrew.

People like Dayna are the inspiration behind UJA Federation's Inclusion Task Force. The task force aims to promote full participation in Jewish life for people with disabilities and their families. According to chair, Stan Kugelmass, the task force looks at the issue from two perspectives. "What resources are available in the community to serve people with special needs? Where are the gaps - how can resources be better made available?"

Kugelmass believes that it is incumbent upon community organizations to make sure that their resources are available to everyone. "In the past they haven't been. Not out of ill will or a lack of concern, but out of happenstance."

A centralized committee dealing with inclusion is important because "for many years the Jewish community has tried to respond to the needs of people with special needs, but there hasn't been an organized approach," says Kugelmass. The task force is changing that. "The goal of the committee is to change attitudes and create action," he says. He and his fellow task force members intend to do this by instructing people on how to be inclusive.

And, notes Robin Gofine, UJA Federation's director of Community Planning, "We have the resources, leadership, and position within the community to influence change."

Kugelmass knows first-hand the difference that inclusion can make. His developmentally-disabled daughter recently participated in a birthright israel trip. "She had the most empowering, positive, inclusive experience that you can ever imagine for somebody who struggles with self confidence and has language difficulties.... She just flowered in that experience."

More than 25 physically or developmentally disabled individuals have traveled to Israel with birthright. They are integrated as much as possible, with "shadows" accompanying those who need extra assistance.

But Kugelmass is quick to note that the trip's other participants also benefit from the presence of disabled individuals. "It is a mutually beneficial situation," he says.

The idea that integration benefits the community as a whole is echoed by Sandy Keshen, president and CEO of Reena.

"We all need a sense of belonging. Need it in our entire being," Keshen says. "So if there are events or programs in our community that are not as inclusive of our population, where they don't feel welcome, or we don't ensure that the environment is respectful of who they are, then we're not taking the time to include them in our community."

"Isn't this part of being Jewish, to be all inclusive and not exclude anybody?" asks Blustein.

Tax deadline approaching

With the New Year quickly approaching, many Canadians are making last-minute charitable donations. This helps the community, the individual charitable organizations that receive much-needed funds, and the donors who can put some cash back in their pockets.

"If you have made a pledge to the UJA Federation Annual Campaign, it is important to make your payment before December 31, 2005," says Jeff Springer, campaign director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Springer also notes that paying for your gift before the end of the year enables UJA Federation to fulfill its commitments to its beneficiary agencies in Toronto and overseas in a timely manner.

Here are a few tips for year end contributions:

- If you make a gift of appreciated securities, you will receive a tax receipt for the full value of the shares this year, and the gain will be taxed at 50% less than if you sold the shares and made a gift of cash.
- Buy a State of Israel Bond through UJA Federation or donate your matured Bond to UJA Federation. Please call the UJA office prior to purchasing your bond.
- Take advantage of our secure online payment site, www.ujadonations.com and receive an instant tax receipt by e-mail. You can pay by VISA, MasterCard or American Express. It's quick and easy and saves administrative costs.
- For your convenience, you can pay your pledge through internet or telephone banking at most major banks throughout Canada.

"The important thing to remember," says Shimmy Wenner, UJA Federation assistant campaign director, "is that if you haven't already paid your gift this year, you should do so before the end of the year to take advantage of the tax benefits."

For more information, please call Shimmy Wenner at 416.631-5699.

Just do it: a Chanukah lesson

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

Our sages often wondered what Chanukah was really about. After we finish telling all of the stories that we were raised with about the meaning of the holiday, some really nagging questions pop up in their place, because Chanukah is not some simple child's celebration – it is a very adult moment, with some very adult thoughts and problems.

The classic story tells of how the Macabees returned to Jerusalem to liberate it. They entered the Temple and cleared it of the idols placed there by the Syrian vandals. Judah and his followers built a new altar, which he dedicated on the 25th of the month of Kislev in the year 3622.

Since the Syrians had stolen the original golden menorah nearly 600 years earlier, the Maccabees made one out of a cheaper metal. When they wanted to light it, they found only a small cruse of pure olive oil bearing the seal of Yochanan, the high priest. It was sufficient to burn only for one day. By a miracle of God, it continued to burn for eight days, until new oil was made available. That miracle proved that God had again taken His people under His protection. In memory of this, our sages appointed these eight days for annual thanksgiving and for lighting candles. And this is the story that is known to us all.

However, some problems remain.

For one, why did the menorah have to burn for eight days – couldn't they have made some new oil?

As well, why did the oil have to have the seal of the high priest (the kohen hagadol), as all oil would have been ritually pure – kosher – for the lighting?

The answers to these and many more questions have filled pages and pages of writings by rabbis throughout our history, and they are perplexing, because on some level it's a struggle to understand just what it is we are celebrating. While I am not able to give answers to all of these questions, I would like to offer one that I learned years ago, and I hope it will give new purpose and meaning to this very special holiday.

In a book he named the Beit Yosef, the great sage Rabbi Yosef Karo wrote his particular answers to the many questions surrounding Chanukah. He says the miracle of Chanukah was not that the Maccabees found only one cruse of oil with the seal of the high priest, and the miracle is not that it burned for eight days (since the first day wasn't a miracle, as there was enough oil to last that first day).

No, the miracle is found in something else.

He says that when Judah and the other Hasmoneans entered the Temple and decided to rededicate it for Jewish worship, they wanted to do this as quickly as possible. The final touch was the lighting of the Menorah, and when they only found one small bottle of oil (some say the nearest olive press and groves was a trip of four days each way), they were faced with a problem.

Should they light the menorah at all, only to see its lights go out after only one day? Or, should they wait a week and then begin the lighting when they can be sure there will be oil to refill it?

The Hasmoneans did the illogical and lit the Menorah. And not only did they light the Menorah, but they used the regular large wicks that would create a large flame. The Hasmoneans could have stretched the oil out by using tiny wicks, but they had a desire to do the right thing, to do it the way it was meant to be done. So they damned the consequences and went with their hearts. As a result, we have the holiday of Chanukah.

For us, there come times in all of our lives when we should not be logical or completely reasonable. We cannot carefully balance every action against the ledger of reason and sensibility – at times we need to close our eyes and march forward. These are the great moments of life – to not simply see what is, but what could be.

Chag orot samayach!

We should meet at modest simchahs

By MURRAY TEITEL

Guest Voice

When my father had his bar mitzvah in Poland in 1933, the party consisted of a kuchin my grandmother had baked the day before, a slice of which each worshipper was given on leaving the shul.

Six years later, it was his brother's turn. By then, the family had been established in Toronto for four years and was, it would appear, more prosperous. So, for Uncle Milton's bar mitzvah, Zaida bought chick peas, herring and two bottles of whisky.

What my father-in-law remembers of his bar mitzvah is that people threw nuts at him. He, at least, got a present: a pocket watch from a relative in New York.

These bar mitzvah boys didn't have a DJ. They managed without a smoke machine. Their entrance into a banquet hall was not preceded by dancing go-go girls, nor was it on the back of a Harley Davidson, nor in a harness lowered from the ceiling of a former movie theatre now turned into a simchah venue. No sports celebrities were paid to attend and no 20-minute movie of their lives was shown to guests.

And yet, somehow, all three turned out Jewish.

Have our bar and bat mitzvah celebrations gone too far over the top? I would say yes, and I can think of four good reasons to stop making them occasions for lavish displays of wealth.

The first is that it's insensitive to those who can't afford it. Many parents don't have $15,000 to spend on lighting and $5,000 for prizes from Lululemon Athletica. Some, not wanting their children to feel embarrassed in front of their wealthier classmates, take on huge debts to stage events they can't afford.

This opinion is supported by Jewish law. The Talmud (in Tractate Moed Katan III) states that the custom of burying the dead in ever fancier burial shrouds and coffins was creating problems for poor people. Burying a dead person became harder on his relatives than his actual death, to the point where some would leave him in the house and abscond. Then, Rabban Gamliel, head of the rabbinical assembly in Yavne, saw to it that he himself would be buried in a simple flax shroud. People thereafter followed his example.

The second reason we should tone down these events is that spending money lavishly is not the way to introduce a child to the age of mitzvot, responsibility and Jewish values.

Again, our sages support this view. In Tractate Yoma (III), the question is how the box used to draw pre-Yom Kippur lots that determined which goat would be sacrificed and which would be thrown off the mountain could have been made of wood. The lottery, after all, took place in the Temple, where implements in God's service had to be made of precious materials. The answer is that since this box was not really used in God's service, it could be made of wood. From this, we learn we should spend money on things that are truly important.

A third argument against lavish simchahs is that they make Jews and Judaism look bad in the eyes of non-Jews. In an age of increasing anti-Semitism, this point can't be overemphasized.

Maimonides decreed that the entire congregation should recite the Shmoneh Esrei together, because those who had already recited it would talk during the repetition. This, he said, was a chillul HaShem in the eyes of Muslims who witnessed it and would say that "the Jews spit, expectorate and chatter in the middle of their prayers."

The final argument requires no rabbinic justification. It's that these parties can only cause Jewish youth who are serious, caring, and spiritual – and who want to devote a part of their lives to the repair of the world – to be turned off Judaism. How are they to react when they realize a $50,000 party costs the equivalent of the combined per capita GDP of the world's 46 poorest nations? Serious young people from affiliated Jewish homes are turning to eastern religions, international development and left-wing causes – anything but Judaism and Israel – to fulfill a need to lead meaningful lives. They're turned off a culture that promotes material excess.

We might all take a page from the Agudah movement, which 14 years ago published detailed guidelines limiting what people can do to celebrate simchahs. I'd personally like to see a return to the golden age of chick peas and herring. Until then, such guidelines are a step in the right direction.

Jewish Life

Bringing light into the darkness

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

With Chanukah just around the corner, it's time to bring out the candles and chanukiyah.

There are countless beautiful and artistic chanukiyot that fill Jewish stores and homes, and we will all kindle eight candles on the last night, filling the chanukiyah with light.

The image of the chanukiyah is based on the original menorah that stood in the ancient Temple – the very same menorah that the Maccabee fighters lit upon rededicating the Temple and the same menorah that connects the holiday of Chanukah with one tiny jar of olive oil.

The connection between the chanukiyah and the menorah is crucial.

The book of Exodus describes the menorah that was designed in the wilderness in great detail. This original menorah was the basis of all future models that sat in the Temple. The biblical description is complex and rich. There is a central shaft from which six branches extend. The branches include sculpted forms of flower components and the lights themselves sit inside the sculpted form of almond blossoms. Many of the drawings of the menorah from early in the Common Era, as well as some medieval drawings, show a three-dimensional figure with branches extending in all directions.

While we are familiar with the menorah image that shows the branches extending as curves from the main shaft, Maimonides' drawing shows the branches extending as straight arms from the shaft. Today, we see both images around the city. Regardless of whether a menorah's branches are curved or straight, throughout Jewish history the menorah design and the image of a tree have been linked. The main trunk, the branches that extend and the petals and blossoms all contribute to the image.

Since the beginning of Jewish text, the image of the tree has been central to many of our narratives and many of our strong symbols. When God creates humans, there already existed a Tree of Knowledge and a Tree of Life. We are drawn to both. Once we are exiled from the Garden of Eden, we fear that our path has been blocked and we will never again be able to touch these unique trees. Yet the Torah assures us that the essence of these trees remain with us at all times.

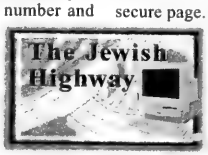
The Torah itself, embodying within it our relationship with God, is referred to as our Tree of Life. Although we have eaten from the Tree of Knowledge, that knowledge can sit idly within us or it can illuminate the world. In the midrash, our sages state that those who study Torah emanate light to the world wherever they are. The connection between light and knowledge is a strong one.

The image of the menorah in the wilderness combines these two symbols. The menorah's function is to be lit and its image is that of a tree. We light a chanukiyah at Chanukah to remember the Maccabees and our miraculous victory, to remember how a small jar of oil could change the world, and to remember to always bring knowledge and light into the darkness that surrounds us.

Online shopping tips

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Whether you are looking for the perfect Chanukah gift, shopping for a special present for an upcoming bar/bat mitzvah or wedding or looking for a hard-to-find Jewish book, the Internet has opened a world of variety for Judaica from around the world. But before you type in your credit card number and press the "order" button, there are a few guidelines you should follow to make sure you get your merchandise – and no nasty surprises.



Here are some tips for novice and veteran online shoppers:

• Get to know the online merchant. Try to deal with sites that have proven track records. Read the fine print. Do they have a code of conduct? If you are working against a deadline, find out if they offer a guaranteed delivery date for your purchase.

• Check out the merchant's privacy policy. You may be getting a bargain, but in return you are sharing a lot of personal information about yourself. Find out if they have a privacy policy and are going to share it with other vendors without your expressed permission? Even if they say they won't, never give out more information than is absolutely necessary to complete the order. Print out a copy of your order and check it against your credit card statement.

• Make sure you are dealing with a "secure" site before you send any personal information over the Internet. Take a look at the website address. Instead of starting with http:// it should begin with https://. The extra "s" means that there is a higher level of security to help ensure that your information is not intercepted. As well, most browsers will display an image of a closed padlock or an unbroken key along the edge of the screen to indicate that you are on a secure page. Unfortunately, this is not foolproof because scam artists have been known to forge secure addresses and icons.

• Don't forget the extras. The price you see online may be accurate but don't forget the extras. Are you paying in a foreign currency? If so, what exchange rate are you getting? Don't forget about handling and shipping costs. Some vendors require that you pay for shipping insurance as well. And if the merchandise is crossing the border, you could also be facing taxes and duty.

• "It's lovely but…" Check the returns policy. Do you get to try out your product, and if so, for how long? If you receive the wrong item or if it is broken, you should be able to return it and be reimbursed for the return shipping costs. However, if it is as promised but you just don't like it, you will be expected to absorb the extra shipping costs – if you are allowed to return it at all.

• Be particularly careful about offers that come in the e-mail. The offer may look genuine and it may seem to come from a reputable retailer. But when you click on the link, take a close look at the address that you are taken to. Is it really from that retailer or have you been diverted to another site with a similar-looking URL (address)? If so, you could be a potential victim of "phishing," a scam to trick you into divulging your credit card information. As well, clicking on dubious links could expose your computer to viruses or spyware.

• Consider using a separate credit card just for Internet purchases. Despite all your precautions, your credit card information could still fall into the wrong hands. Having to cancel your card will play havoc with all the automatic payments (phone, cable, tzedakah, etc.) that you have set up. Consider having a credit card that you use exclusively for Internet purchases. If you need to cancel, the inconvenience is limited. By the way, credit companies usually cover most or all fraudulent charges if reported promptly. Check your company's policy.

• Browse globally – shop locally. If you see something that you like on the Internet, check out whether the same item is available at your local Judaica store. The Internet can be a wonderful window into the Jewish books and gifts. But if you can find the same merchandise locally for a comparable price, then by all means support your local merchant and economy.

My intention hasn't been to thoroughly frighten you from shopping over the Internet. Most people have never encountered a problem buying over the web. And if you would like to join those shoppers, just keep these tips in mind.

Chabad launches Mississauga minchah minyan

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Chabad of Mississauga's Rabbi Yitzchok Slavin estimates he's received about 50 calls in the past year from people looking for a minyan.

Some of them are travellers catching an early flight at nearby Pearson International Airport. Others live and/or work in the area and are interested in an afternoon minyan.

During the winter, it's particularly difficult for people who commute to Mississauga to get back to Toronto for Minchah, Rabbi Slavin said.

The afternoon prayer service must be recited before sunset, which is as early as 4:41 p.m. in Toronto during December. For convenience, Minchah is commonly held immediately before sunset and followed by the traditional evening prayers (Ma'ariv, or Arvit). Some people, however, find it more practical to attend early Minchah services and a late Ma'ariv minyan.

On Dec. 1, Chabad of Mississauga held its first Minchah minyan. About 15 people, including a couple of yeshiva students who offer their services for study sessions and visiting the elderly, turned up that day. The minyan is expected to be a weekly event, although the actual day has not yet been determined.

But if someone needs a minyan on another day – if they are marking a yahrzeit and want to say Kaddish, for example – Rabbi Slavin said he has a list of about 20 people he can call to put together the traditional prayer quorum of 10 men.

Rabbi Slavin and his wife Sara moved to Mississauga in 2003 to establish a Chabad presence there, organizing holiday celebrations and doing outreach.

Mississauga has a Jewish community of about 2,500, according to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Solel Congregation of Mississauga, a Reform synagogue established in 1973, has 300 member families, while B'nai Shalom Congregation of Halton-Peel, a fledgling egalitarian Conservative congregation now in its second year, has 16 member families and holds monthly Shabbat services.

Chabad holds monthly educational Shabbat services at the Slavins' home, while the new minyan takes place in the office of a local business at Dixie Road and Eglinton Avenue W. at 1 p.m.

The service itself takes only 15 to 18 minutes, said Rabbi Slavin. Kosher refreshments – either lunch or baked goods and coffee – are served afterward, and participants are encouraged to stay for a brief Torah class.

The mid-day timing of the service emphasizes the uniqueness of the prayer, said Rabbi Slavin. "Whenever you daven Minchah is great, but the uniqueness of it is emphasized when… you're in the middle of a busy day and you're setting aside time for God."

Chabad of Mississauga's current projects include a new website – www.jewishmississauga.org – and an upcoming public Chanukah menorah lighting, scheduled for Dec. 29 at 5:30 p.m. at Mississauga City Hall.

The rabbi is also hoping to organize a morning minyan, and is working on a list of potential participants.

Eva Goldfinger is Canada's first Humanistic rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eva Goldfinger, a longtime spiritual leader at Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, is now Rabbi Eva Goldfinger, the first Humanistic rabbi in Canada.

Her ordination took place in October at the Farmington Hills, Mich.-based International Institute for Secular Humanistic Judaism (IISHJ), where she also serves on the faculty.

To people affiliated with the Secular Humanistic Jewish movement, which dates back to 1963, there is nothing contradictory about her new designation and the "secular" aspect of the movement.

"People think 'secular' with a small 's,'" the 55-year-old psychotherapist said in a recent interview. In this case, she explained, "secular" refers to a Jewish social activist background.

"People think we don't care about our Jewish heritage, and we're very concerned about our Jewishness and the continuity of Judaism. We're just not interested in the continuity of a Judaism that's monolithic, or only about one way to be Jewish."

The Humanistic way of being Jewish upends some of the cornerstones of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Judaism. Although services include Jewish cultural and ethical elements, there are no prayers, and there is no mention of God. The Torah is considered "special" for its literary and historical value, but Humanistic Judaism doesn't consider it God-given.

Rabbi Goldfinger's involvement in the movement is a dramatic departure from her upbringing in a haredi community in Toronto. A graduate of Bais Yaakov High School for Girls who was raised in a chassidic family, she became a feminist as a young teenager, expanding her knowledge of the outside world by reading with a flashlight under her covers at night.

She attended university, moved out of her parents' home, and was married to a secular Jewish man – all painful circumstances for her parents, both of whom are now deceased. Her level of religious observance was minimal.

"The funny thing is, I ended up being incredibly Jewish [but] not the way [my parents] would have wanted."

She doesn't believe that Humanistic Judaism is a fringe movement. "I believe they represent a large part of the belief system of a large number of Jews."

A bat mitzvah she attended more than 20 years ago at an Orthodox synagogue, featuring "lots of singing," made her realize that she didn't want her two daughters, now in their twenties, to have "nothing" in terms of Judaism.

"I wanted them to have a passionate Jewish upbringing, but not a religious one… In those days I still believed in God, but not… in the sense of observance, and the rules of Halachah," she said.

Rabbi Goldfinger – Eva, as she prefers to be called – found her niche in the precursor of Oraynu, which now has about 100 families. "It was about peoplehood, not about the religious elements."

The congregation, then known as the Secular Jewish Association, celebrated Rabbi Goldfinger's ordination and its 36th anniversary earlier this month.

Rabbi Goldfinger is now the congregation's director of life cycle. She also travels to California once a month to serve as rabbi at a Humanistic congregation there, and she maintains her psychotherapy practice.

Eva Goldfinger

On joining the Humanistic Jewish community here, she immediately took an active role – teaching and creating services "that don't serve God but are affirmations of what we are and what we need to be."

In the late 1980s, Rabbi Goldfinger was ordained as a madrichah (leader) of the movement, in part as a step toward becoming an officiant at marriage ceremonies, including intermarriages and same-sex weddings.

The IISHJ's rabbinic program – which used to require a PhD in Jewish studies but now requires only a master's degree– was not instituted until 1991.

"We were resisting," she said.

The term "rabbi" had "too many authoritarian connotations," she added. "That's not how we like to see ourselves."

The movement, which in Canada has communities in Toronto, Vancouver, Victoria and Winnipeg, serves people who would not otherwise be served by the Jewish community, said Rabbi Goldfinger.

"Fifty years from now, as long as people are doing something that they're calling Jewish and are conscious that they're doing it because they're Jewish, and are informed about Jewish history, does it really matter if they're doing the same thing or something different? Who ever heard of giving presents on Chanukah, until North America? We're competing with Christmas. We're constantly changing. Orthodoxy is changing… The only thing that's sure about Judaism is that it's dynamic.

"To me, diversity is the only guarantee of survival… If Orthodoxy were the only way to be Jewish, I wouldn't be Jewish today."

Gulf War influenced reporter's career choice

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It wasn't until the Gulf War began in 1990 that Dana Levenson realized that her calling was to become a television news reporter.

As she watched Israel being attacked by missiles, her nose glued to the television set for 72 hours, Levenson turned to her friend, pointed to the reporter and said, "That's what I want to do."

But before Levenson, a reporter for CTV News in Toronto, discovered her passion for informing the masses, she had her sights set on a different career.

"Up until university, I focused on theatre. I spent all my extracurricular time on theatre and grew up at the Leah Posluns theatre on stage," she said.

When Levenson graduated from a North York high school at 17, a year earlier than most of her peers, she had every intention of trying to make it in New York City as an actress.

But her goals quickly changed after her first visit to Israel.

"I went to Israel in 1988 for my first time and it changed my life," said the 35-year-old.

"For the first time in my life, I realized the world was such a big place, that there was so much more out there."

Although she was enrolled in the film studies program at the University of Western Ontario, Levenson decided to spend her summers at the Sde Boker kibbutz about 55 kilometres south of Be'er Sheva, where she fell in love with the Israeli movement, the culture and an Israeli boy.

But her love of the country didn't stop her from going home to get the education she needed to become a reporter.

Levenson eventually enrolled at Ryerson University in Toronto in the radio and television arts program, where she honed her skills as a broadcast journalist.

To date, Levenson has been a part of the CTV News team for six years, but her journey was one filled with hard work and determination.

After she graduated from Ryerson, Levenson landed an internship with Dan Rather at CBS in New York.

When she returned to Toronto to freelance for every local news channel she could think of, CTV approached her with a job as the station's weather person.

From there, after having paid her dues as a weather person, Levenson moved on to local news and now considers herself a link between current events and the Jewish community.

She said she is "by no means religious," but is still active in her community, which gives her an "awareness that other non-Jewish reporters may not have.

"Having a pulse in the Jewish community has helped my reporting. The Jewish community is so tight it feels like an honour to represent our own," she said, adding that people stop her parents in the streets to express their pride in her.

Dana Levenson

"Being Jewish doesn't mean I'm biased, but I do have a different perspective," she added.

She recalled a story she developed when she visited with the family of 48-year-old David Rosenzweig, the Orthodox man who was murdered outside a kosher pizza restaurant in 2002.

She felt that her connection to the Jewish community is what helped her forge a relationship with the family and best portray the situation to the rest of the community.

Levenson said that what she loves most about her job is meeting new people every day.

"It is fascinating being exposed to people's lives that you would never be exposed to otherwise."

Regardless of what kind of story Levenson is covering, there is nothing that excites her more than breaking news stories and live coverage.

"I love live TV," she said. "I thrive on live TV. Everything pales in comparison to live TV. The rush you get in comparable to being on stage."

A close second to developing a breaking news story is doing a human interest piece.

"I love doing stories where I feel like I've made a difference in people's lives. Then I really feel like I've accomplished something."

Although Levenson was adamant about how much she loves her job and feels blessed to be where she is today, there is another ambition she refuses to give up on.

"I have always wanted [Today Show host] Katie Couric's job," she said with conviction.

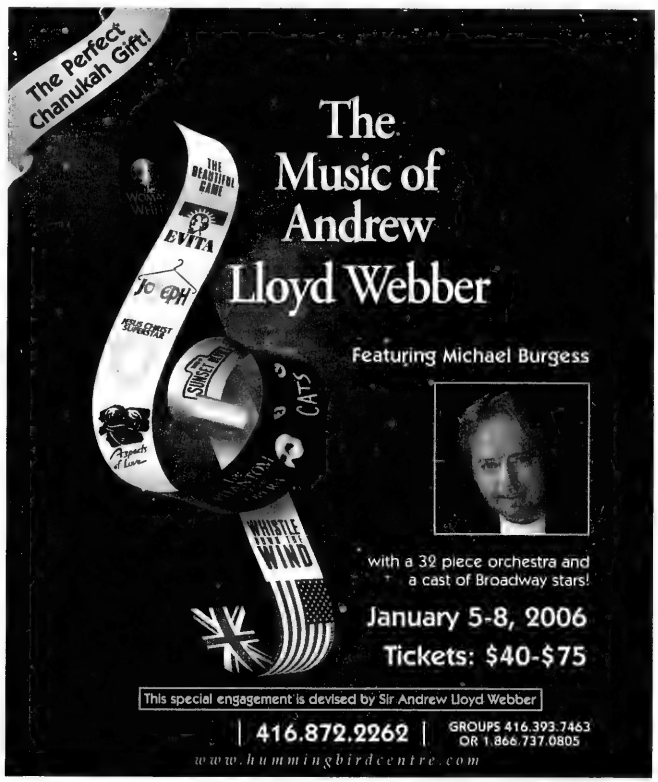
As focused as Levenson is on her career, she now juggles her career with a new passion: her first-born and only son.

"I haven't found it hard at all," Levenson said about jumping back into work after ending her maternity leave. "I go to work feeling so happy, so blessed. And I am so happy in both roles."

She said that what made her transition into motherhood so easy is her husband, who has always supported her ambitions to follow her dreams.

While she would consider any opportunity that may come her way, there is one assignment that Levenson would never turn down.

"I still feel in my heart one day, I will be reporting [in Israel]. Everything would come full circle if [CTV] sent me to Israel."



Canada's UN shift exposes common coverage errors

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Canada's recent decision to change its vote to "no" on three anti-Israel UN resolutions was both praised and criticized in the media.

In a Nov. 30 speech to the United Nations General Assembly, Canadian Charges d'affaires Gilbert Laurin said the language of the resolutions "creates a sense of imbalance, and seems to suggest that it is only Israel that has obligations... The responsibilities of other actors, including Palestinians, are often not sufficiently emphasized, nor are references to Israeli security needs. Canada will not support resolutions that use emotive language in place of straight facts."

Many people – even UN diplomats – ignore the fact that UN Security Council Resolution 242, which underlines all peace-making efforts between Israel and Arab states, calls for Israeli territorial compromise in the context of peace and security guarantees from its neighbours.

The annual ritual of anti-Israel General Assembly resolutions makes a mockery of this stipulation. It also highlights how the genuine peace-making efforts of the UN have been hijacked by non-democratic states intent on punishing Israel.

The Winnipeg Free Press editorial "Canada stands firm" (Dec. 6) noted that these resolutions are meant "to vilify and isolate Israel" and "contribute nothing to the peace process. In fact, they undermine efforts to achieve some sort of lasting agreement between Israelis and Palestinians."

The Free Press commends Canada for "attempting to inject not only morality but much-needed reality into the UN debate on the Middle East. In doing so, it is not taking sides among groups of Canadian voters. It is recognizing that a settlement in the Middle East must be based on an accommodation that recognizes the rights of all involved." And that recognizes the obligations of those involved as well, it should be added.

In "Canada makes an about-face on Mideast" (Toronto Star, Dec. 4), columnist Haroon Siddiqui in effect criticized Canada's "pro-Israel shift" for "[breaking] away from the overwhelming consensus of the international community, including Europe."

Siddiqui noted that "Canada said the resolution[s] put the onus on one, not both parties." "But," he immediately added, "the [General] Assembly put the greater burden on the party engaged in the illegal occupation."

Contrary to Siddiqui's claim, Israel's presence in territories it captured in its 1967 war of self-defence is not "illegal." As has been pointed out many times in this space, under Resolution 242, Israel's presence is legitimate (i.e. legal) pending a negotiated exchange of land for peace. (This is the policy long favoured by the majority of Israelis and pursued by successive Israeli governments.) Siddiqui's error on this critical fact is often repeated by others, and it skews his entire analysis.

By adhering to the facts, Canada was absolutely right to demand that resolutions concerning the Israel-Palestinian conflict place expectations on both parties.

On Dec. 6, a day after a suicide bomber in Netanya killed five Israelis and injured about 50, Toronto's CFRB talk radio station discussed Canada-Israel relations.

Substitute morning host Peter Sherman strongly defended Prime Minister Paul Martin's Nov. 13 assertion at the United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto that Israel's values are Canada's values.

"Why do I think that these values are similar? Because... we're talking about the only legitimate democracy in that entire [Mideast] region. And we're a democracy. Both Israel and Canada are imperfect, as all democracies are," Sherman said.

"Our prime minister made a statement that is patently true. If you want to democratize other countries in the Middle East, by all means go ahead. I would say that as imperfect as both Canada's and Israel's democracies are, the thing we have in common, and very strongly so, [is that we] are democracies. We do speak freely, we write freely, we engage in discourse and discussion and they don't do that in Iran, and they don't do that in the [United Arab] Emirates, and they don't do it in Syria."

United Bakers — Toronto institution since 1912

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

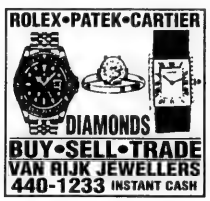
Whether they call it United Bakers, Ladovsky's, United or UB, the bustling, often noisy dairy restaurant now located in Lawrence Plaza, has been part of the Jewish community since 1912.

Founded by Aaron Ladovsky, grandfather of current proprietors, siblings Philip and Ruthie Ladovsky, UB first opened its doors downtown at Bay and Dundas streets. In 1920, it moved to 338 Spadina Ave., and just over 20 years ago relocated to its current location.

Speaking from a spot in their restaurant where they could still keep an eye on the comings and goings – they personally greet almost everyone who comes in – Philip and Ruthie said that their father, Herman, and his twin brother, Sam, grew up in the business, and they became involved in the late '70s.

"When our grandfather ran the restaurant, he attracted everyone from business leaders to workers. UB became a link to the new world. Newcomers would come to find others," said Ruthie.

"It became the extension of people's homes. If someone didn't have money, our grandfather made sure they were fed. He wanted them to get a good foothold in the new world," said Philip.



When their father took over in 1955, he continued the tradition, and "with him as a mentor, we try to run the business the same way," said Philip.

It thrills them that they're now seeing a fourth generation of customers. "On a day off from school, I see groups of teens come in whose parents and grandparents were [or still are] UB regulars. We see them grow up from macaroni and cheese to Greek salad," he said.

UB proprietors Ruthie and Philip Ladovsky

There's no secret to the restaurant's longevity, they say. "It's a warm, friendly place where serving staff know your name, and your likes and dislikes.

"And the food always tastes the same. It's consistent and delicious cooking," said Ruthie.

The "core" of their menu remains constant, she said. "We still serve old-time favourites such as sweet gefilte fish, boiled white fish, blintzes and pea soup that go back to our first days, but we've also modernized the menu with [items such as] lasagna, eggplant parmesan and Greek salad. We have something to satisfy all palates."

They have dozens of customers who eat two meals a day at UB, and others who drop in whenever they're in the area, said Philip. "If Ruthie hasn't seen someone in awhile, she's sure to find out why."

People come in and tell them when they become grandparents and when their kids graduate or get married, said Ruthie. "We're not sure how many people have gotten engaged here, and one couple came in on their wedding day to have their picture taken. This place means a lot to them."

Whenever they come in, said Philip, the staff treat them like they're special. No one is more special than each individual person.

"Each staff member has the same commitment we have. They deal with everyone with a combination of warmth and professionalism. No request is too difficult; they get their food the way they like it."

Philip and Ruthie talk about the staff highly, said Helen Zellermayer who has worked at UB for 20 years and whose daughter, Irena, also works there, "but we feel strongly about them.

"When we have a birthday, they contribute to our birthday fund. They come to family weddings and send presents when there are babies. They share in all our joys and sorrows. Philip held my grandson when he was born and he cried [with joy.]

"When our assistant manager's husband died, she asked Philip to write a few words for the eulogy.

"If a customer is ill and the family tells Philip, he sends soup, bagels, tuna – he wants them to know he's thinking of them."

Luz Jorda, who has worked at the restaurant since 1990, said she was able to bring her family into the country because Philip helped her with the proper documents. "My parents are here because of him."

Cathy Szell, at UB for eight years, said her daughter-in-law, who also works there, travels from Barrie twice a week to come to work. "She can find work in Barrie, but she comes here. What does that say?"

Felicia Dragoy has travelled from Thornhill for eight years to come to work. "I could also work closer to home, but this place is like my home."

Ilana Izyaguyev came back to work after her maternity leave, because she knew her bosses would understand if she was having problems. "We can always go to them."

Bina Erdman said she emigrated from Israel 16 years ago, and began working at UB two weeks later. "This is the only place I know. If I had trouble adjusting, I would go to Philip and Ruthie. They're more than owners. I remember their father coming in every day, and he would also ask about us. It's important to them that we work, but it's more important that we're happy."

Meira Zeraviv, a "newcomer" to UB with only two years under her belt, said she wouldn't work anywhere else, and Jeya Gunaratman, from Sri Lanka, said when he got married he received a gift from his customer. "Philip makes us feel good, we make the customers feel good, and everyone is happy."

Deborah Thomson asked, "How many other bosses say thank you when they distribute pay cheques?"

Jane Reiner, at the restaurant for eight years, said until this job, she stayed at every job for five years. "When five years was up here, I renewed my contract," she said, laughing.

Archeological findings support Torah, says Israeli scholar

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Despite a growing trend in academic circles to question the credibility of stories from the Bible, certain archeological findings lend support to what the Torah tells us, according to a leading Israeli scholar.

Prof. Eliezer Oren, the Canada chair of near-eastern archeology at Ben-Gurion University, told an audience gathered recently at Temple Sinai that biblical narratives can be at least somewhat authenticated by ancient relics and other forms of archeological evidence.

"I have great admiration for biblical accounts," he said.

"It has historical references, there is no question about that. The question is, how do we understand them?"

Oren cited a number of discoveries from excavations which suggest the veracity of some biblical references.

For instance, a 1993 discovery in the city of Dan in northern Israel yielded an ancient letter written in Aramaic that referred to the house of David, meaning King David.

"This is the earliest reference to the dynasty of David written 100 years after David's death," said Oren.

"This is a warning to scholars to never rush to judgments on the basis of negative evidence."

Oren alluded to numerous discoveries of Israelite settlements dating back to the 11th and 12th centuries BCE.

"There are hundreds of these settlements, particularly in Samaria," he said. "It suggests very clearly that in the… 11th and 12th centuries, there was a major move of Israelite settlements."

The first archeological record of Israel being mentioned dates from about 1206 or 1207 BCE.

"The reference is to a military campaign conducted by Pharaoh and he mentions conquering Ashkelon," said Oren.

"He says that Israel was destroyed, and that no seed was left."

Oren explained that in the reference, Israel is not referred to as a place or permanent settlement, perhaps meaning it was described as a people.

"It is a designation for 'many' and we know they are on the move," he said.

As for the controversial issues of the Temple Mount, Oren noted that even if excavations were permitted there, few if any findings would likely turn up, because the area has been besieged so many times.

"I am very skeptical about discoveries," he said.

"I doubt we will see any of the wonders Queen Sheba saw."

That being said, Oren referred to temple remains unearthed in Syria that bear stark similarities to the way the ancient Temple is described in the Bible.

"The Syrian excavation of the temple from the 10th century BCE… [demonstrates] this type of temple existed," he related.

"When you look at the descriptions [of the Temple] in the Bible, there are similarities."

Oren noted archeology is not an exact science and there are many gaping holes between what the Bible says and physical evidence.

In his own work doing excavations in the Sinai between 1972 and 1982, Oren and his colleagues did not make a single discovery to potentially verify the story of Exodus and the mass migration of Jews out of Egypt.

"But I did not say we should close the curtain on this," he said.

Sufganiyot for Chanukah: easier to make than you think

BY JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Chanukah is coming. Prepare for an oil crisis – and I don't mean high prices at the pump. Who knew when Judah Maccabee's tiny flask of oil miraculously burned for eight days that for thousands of years Jewish families would celebrate by lighting candles and… frying!

Jews of eastern Europe descent eat mountains of latkes, but the Chanukah treat of choice among Sephardim is sufganiyot, luscious, deep-fried, jam-filled doughnuts.

My friend Pnina Shichor, a former teacher and travel agent, has been making them for years. "When my children were young," she recalled, "my cousin Esther Schechter and I would do Chanukah at our kids' elementary school. We'd tell the story, sing songs, and teach them to make sufganiyot."

When the Shichors were considering transferring their daughter Nomi to a Jewish day school, the little girl was alarmed. "But, Mom," she said, "If I go there, who will do Chanukah for our class?"

In Israeli tradition, every Chanukah, Shichor and hubby David host a huge open house. She stands by the electric frying pan (her implement of choice, so dig yours out of the attic, or you can still get one cheap at a super store) whipping the sufganiyot out by the dozen, and they disappear as quickly as they are filled.

A few years ago, determined to learn her technique, I asked her for a lesson. Busy at work, she invited me to bring all my equipment and ingredients to her travel agency, and between reservations, with phones ringing and faxes faxing, we made doughnuts. (I taught them to my cooking class two days later! Yes, they're that easy.)

These wispy confections are Israel's answer to Krispy Kreme – jelly doughnuts being as popular there for Chanukah as the latke. Instead of injecting the jam into the cakes, you form a depression in the dough and fill them with jam, making them as pretty to look at as they are impossibly irresistible to eat. They are very light doughnuts, reminiscent of beignets, and I like to use different coloured jams for an even showier display.

These heavenly sufganiyot warrant the best quality jams, store-bought or homemade. I like to include my Aunt Sally's Apricot-Pineapple conserve in the mix. A conserve is a thick mixture of fruits, nuts and sugar used as a spread. Take away the nuts and you have preserves. Cut the fruit in smaller pieces and you have jam. Cook it for a shorter time and you have a glorious, fruity sauce with a punch of citrus, begging to be poured over ice cream or cake.

I had never made conserve in my life (or jam or preserves, for that matter) until I tried my Aunt Sally's recipe. It became such a favorite that I included it in my Rosh Hashanah cooking classes as a sauce for honey cake. Talk about easy! I would begin the class by asking for a show of hands, "How many of you have never made jam?" followed by "How many of you can open a can?"

Filling the doughnuts is a great project for kids, and they can even help forming them. Just keep them away from the bubbling oil!

Pnina's recipe for sufganiyot came from her mother-in-law, Malka Suranyi, who brought it from Budapest where the family survived under Nazi rule. (Luckily an uncle owned an exclusive men's clothing store, which the Nazis coveted, so they allowed the workers to live.) After the war, the Communists took over, and David Shichor, now a professor of criminal justice, was barely 16 when the Jewish Agency smuggled him and other children out of Hungary.

"It was just like the film Exodus," Pnina said. "They were taken to a detention camp in Italy. Then 7,000 people were packed onto a boat meant for 400 and sent to Israel."

Pnina met David in Israel where she taught English for a year. "I was totally enthralled with the country and wanted to live there," which the couple did for five years after they married. "That's how I got into the travel business," she said. "I opened Bound to Travel, specializing in Israeli tours."

The Shichors' son Nadav and his family live in Modin, home of the Maccabees and site of the beginning of their revolt for freedom.

"It was customary in history," Pnina noted, "to light a torch on Chanukah, which would start in Modin. Runners would carry it from village to village to announce the holiday." Today there are still races there at Chanukah.

"Occasionally we spend Chanukah in Israel. Every holiday is so richly celebrated there. Each night you go to someone's house to light candles, sing songs, visit and, of course, eat!"

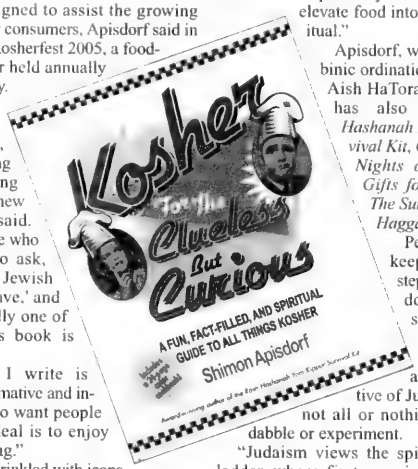
Book about keeping kosher has something for everyone

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Even those who do have a clue will find some tidbit they didn't know about in Kosher for the Clueless but Curious, says its author, Shimon Apisdorf.

"The book is primarily for those with a minimal background in Judaism, but I've written it so anyone can pick it up and say, 'I didn't know this.'"

Commissioned by Star-K, an international kosher certification agency in Baltimore, the book is designed to assist the growing market of kosher consumers, Apisdorf said in an interview at Kosherfest 2005, a food-service trade fair held annually in New York City.



The easy-to-read book is meant for adults, particularly young couples starting new homes and new families, he said. "These are people who are beginning to ask, 'What kind of Jewish home will we have,' and kosher is naturally one of the issues. This book is perfect for them.

"Everything I write is meant to be informative and inspiring, but I also want people to laugh. The ideal is to enjoy what one's reading."

The book is sprinkled with icons that highlight bits of information. They include It's the Law; Myths and Facts; Soul Food – "kosher is very much about the soul"; I'd Better Ask; and That's Not kosher.

The first myth he addresses is that "kosher is sort of like Jewish magic – the rabbi waves his wand and says a few words, and presto, the food is kosher."

The fact is, he says, kosher is a sophisticated matter that incorporates chemistry, biology, technology and spirituality all in one.

"Keeping kosher has genuine spiritual meaning and it can deepen our lives, but I want people to know that it does not have to be overwhelming. It does not have to be an all or nothing proposition.

"Every time we eat, we have the opportunity to use the physical world for a spiritual purpose. If, before eating, we reflect on the notion that the purpose of eating is to enable us to have the health and strength to do good and to live a spiritually centred life, then we elevate food into something spiritual."

Apisdorf, who received rabbinic ordination from Yeshivat Aish HaTorah in Jerusalem, has also written Rosh Hashanah Yom Kippur Survival Kit, Chanukah: Eight Nights of Light, Eight Gifts for the Soul and The Survival Kit Family Haggadah.

People can begin keeping kosher one step at a time, Apisdorf says. "Every step a person takes is meaningful. That is also representative of Judaism, which is not all or nothing. People can dabble or experiment.

"Judaism views the spiritual life as a ladder, whose first rung is planted on the ground and whose top reaches the heavens.

"The issue is not only how high a rung one is on but whether or not one is making an honest effort to grow and climb higher. The defining question is not simply where you are on the ladder but what direction you are moving in."

Those who believe that keeping kosher puts a limit on one's culinary "adventures," he said, "need only take a stroll through the aisles and aisles of foods available here at Kosherfest. About 98 per cent of what a person likes can be kosher. [Kosherfest] attests to that."

Also included with Kosher for the Clueless is a 24-page cookbook with recipes by author Susie Fishbein, including new-age shish kebob, wild mushroom velouté soup, candied almond, pear and goat cheese salad with shallot vinaigrette, chicken shiraz with mushrooms and shallots, and poached pears with chocolate sauce.

"With these recipes I am addressing the myth that kosher food is brown, bland and salty. There is no reason in the world why kosher food can't be knock-your-socks-off delicious," Apisdorf says.

"Keeping kosher never stood in the way of anyone cooking great-looking and great-tasting food. The only limit on kosher food is the cook's imagination."

Get the kids to help fill the doughnuts

Stir yeast into ½ cup warm water in a very large (at least 6-quart) bowl. Stir in 1 tsp. of the sugar and set aside until bubbly, 5 to 10 minutes. Stir in scant 1 cup warm water, salt, oil, remaining sugar and eggs. Add 3 cups of the flour and mix. Gradually knead in remaining flour in the bowl until dough is spongy and elastic, but still feels slightly tacky. Remove dough and oil the sides of the bowl – no need to wash it. Turn dough to coat it all over with oil and return it to the bowl. Loosely cover dough with plastic wrap.

Preheat oven to the lowest setting and turn it off. Let the dough rise in the oven until it nearly reaches the top of bowl, about 2 hours.

Roll out dough on a lightly floured board ¼-in. thick. Cut with a 3-in. biscuit cutter or glass into rounds. Place the rounds, uncovered, on a baking sheet and set aside to rise for 30 minutes.

Heat oil in an electric frying pan, deep fryer, or large, heavy skillet to 365. Dip your fingers in flour and lift a round of dough. Holding the round with both thumbs and forefingers, poke your two middle fingers back and forth in the middle underside of the dough to stretch it quite thin without tearing it. This will be the depression for the jam.

Quickly drop each round into the hot oil, depression side down, a few at a time, without crowding, and cover the pot for about 30 seconds or until golden brown but not dark. Quickly turn them, cover the pot, and fry until the other side is golden brown. Drain the doughnuts on both sides on paper towels. Repeat with the remaining rounds of dough. Fill the depressions with jam and dust with confectioners' sugar. Best when eaten warm. They don't keep well, but no matter. You won't have leftovers. Makes about 3½ dozen.

AUNT SALLY'S APRICOT-PINEAPPLE CONSERVE

1 lb. dried apricots, cut in half or in thirds
1 can (20 oz.) crushed pineapple, undrained

Orange Blossom Jam as seen in The Scent of Orange Blossoms: Sephardic Cuisine from Morocco by Kitty Morse and Danielle Mamane, Ten Speed publishers.

3½ cups sugar
grated zest of 1 orange
1 cup orange juice
½ tsp. salt
¼ cup broken walnuts (optional)

Cover the apricots with water in a medium saucepan and boil for 15 minutes or until the water is almost evaporated. Stir in the pineapple, sugar, orange rind, juice and salt. Boil, stirring often, until there is almost no free liquid when a spoonful is placed on a saucer – about 20 minutes. Stir in the walnuts, if using, during the last 5 minutes of cooking.

Seal according to the manufacturer's directions, or pour into jars, allow to come to room temperature, and freeze. Makes about 2 pints.

As a topping for ice cream or cake: Snip apricots to the size of raisins. Stop boiling when the mixture is fairly loose (looser than you would like to serve it, as it will congeal as it cools). Serve warm over cake or ice cream.

Happy Hannukah!

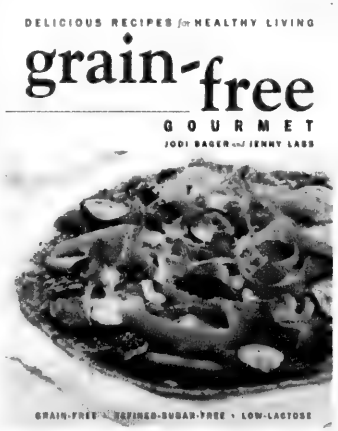
Grain-free cooking: healthy and delicious

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jodi Bager and Jenny Lass are out to prove that grain-free food can be delicious and easy to prepare.

Co-authors of Grain-Free Gourmet, they offer a collection of grain-free, refined-sugar free, low-lactose recipes that can enhance the holiday season for those with intestinal problems or dietary restrictions.



The seeds of the book were planted, they say, when the two met on their way to a potluck dinner hosted by the late Elaine Gottschall, author of Breaking The Vicious Cycle, a book about the Specific Carbohydrate Diet (SCD).

The diet, which eliminates complex carbohydrates found in refined sugars, grains and starches, was developed in the 1940s by Drs. Sidney and Merril Haas to help people who did not respond to a gluten-free diet.

Bager, who was diagnosed with ulcerative colitis after the birth of her second child in 2000, and Lass, who has celiac disease, connected immediately, they say.

"We began talking about recipes, and realized we both had the same philosophy about food. We wanted to create healthy, delicious recipes that we could serve to our friends and family," says Bager, owner of J. Gourmet, a line of sugar-free, grain-free baked goods.

Lass, a freelance medical writer, cooking instructor and owner of WordLink communications, says their book is different from gluten-free books, because it addresses the multiple dietary needs of people with intestinal problems.

"Many people who are gluten intolerant are lactose intolerant as well. We also offer no complex carbohydrates or disaccharides [two sugars linked together] because people with intestinal problems can find them hard to digest.

"We use almond flour as a grain substitute for baking because it closely approximates wheat flour in terms of taste and texture and it lowers blood cholesterol levels, and we substitute honey for sugar."

In essence, she says, they use the basic SCD ingredients – animal protein, nuts, seeds, eggs, honey, fruits, most vegetables and some forms of dairy products.

"The diet can be delicious and fun," says Bager. "Those who think a grain-free diet is boring or mundane, haven't tried our recipes."

They offer the following recipes.

GOURMET PIZZA

1/2 cup almond flour
1 tbsp. grated Parmesan cheese
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. dried basil
1/2 tsp. dried oregano
1/4 tsp. dried thyme
1 tsp. olive oil
1 large egg
tomato paste or tomato sauce pizza toppings of your choice
Parmesan cheese, grated

Heat the oven to 325. Line a cookie sheet with parchment paper and grease with olive oil. Combine the almond flour, cheese, salt, basil, oregano, thyme, olive oil and egg in a mixing bowl. The dough will be the consistency of cookie batter. Spread the dough thinly on the cookie sheet to a 6- to 8-in. diameter. Top with tomato paste or sauce. Spread on your pizza toppings and sprinkle generously with Parmesan cheese. Drizzle olive oil over the pizza. Bake 18 to 20 minutes.

Make-ahead Pizza Crusts

You can make a pizza crust and freeze it for almost instant pizza. Make the dough and flatten with a rolling pin between two pieces of parchment paper or plastic wrap until it's the appropriate diameter. Make it very thin for a gourmet, thin-crust pizza. Freeze the flattened dough, still between the parchment paper or plastic wrap, in a plastic freezer bag or sealed container to prevent freezer burn. No need to thaw before baking – just add the sauce and toppings, and bake at 325 for 20 minutes. Serves 1.

SAND COOKIES

2 2/3 cups almond flour
1/2 lb. butter, softened
1/4 cup honey
1 cup pecan meal (finely ground pecans)

Heat oven to 300. Mix all the ingredients together. Shape the cookies into small crescents or half moons and place close together on a greased cookie sheet. Bake for 15 minutes, until the edges begin to brown. Makes 4 dozen.

Book recounts man's torture in Saudi Arabia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian marketing consultant William Sampson has been to hell and back.

Five years ago, while working in Saudi Arabia for the Saudi Industrial Development Fund, he was grabbed by thugs, thrown into a car, shoved into a prison cell and tortured, brutalized and raped.

All because he was accused of being a British spy and fomenting unrest. The charges, of course, were fabricated.

Sampson endured 963 days of imprisonment and solitary confinement. That he survived his ordeal without going mad is one of the miracles of our times.

Now he has written a strong account of his days and nights in a squalid Saudi jail. Confessions of an Innocent Man (McClelland & Stewart) will shock and jolt a reader.

Sampson, a bachelor, chose to work in Saudi Arabia, a major U.S. ally, because he thought it would be a fascinating experience. "Its remoteness, its barrenness and its closed nature were all things that intrigued me, and the only way I could see it was by going there on business," he writes.

And while he enjoyed its magnificent desert scenery and its outdoor markets, Sampson was soon disillusioned by Saudi Arabia's narrowness and insularity. There were no cinemas, theatres, concert halls or music clubs, and restaurants were segregated by sex and marital status.

And while westerners were tolerated by educated and affluent Saudis, they were resented by the lower classes. It didn't take long for Sampson to conclude that oil-rich Saudi Arabia was not exactly a haven of tolerance and openness. As he puts it: "It was the most culturally and politically xenophobic country in which I had lived."

His problems with the authorities began on Dec. 17, 2000, when he was arrested and implicated in a series of car bombings, which were probably planned by Islamic fundamentalists, who hate the Saudi monarchy.

His tormentors wanted Sampson to admit that he had planted and detonated the bombs, but he refused to co-operate. And so he was relentlessly tortured.

"The pain they would inflict on me was beyond my imagination," he writes.

Worse still, Sampson's sadistic torturers derived intense enjoyment and pleasure from his suffering.

Not being able to bear the torture, Sampson confessed. And just when he thought that the worst was over, his jailers repeatedly raped him.

Never had he been so humiliated.

Sampson claims that his torturers were trained by British, American and Israeli intelligence services. With all due respect to him, I have never read a single account stating that Israel has trained Saudi security officials. As Sampson knows, Israel has no relations with Saudi Arabia.

At one point during his incarceration, an English-speaking Saudi officer looked Sampson straight in the eye and said, "Jew." When Sampson asked the Saudi why he believed he was Jewish, the Saudi replied, "It is obvious."

It finally dawned on Sampson why the Saudi was so sure of himself.

"In his limited world view only two types of men are circumcised: Muslims and Jews. As I was not a Muslim, then I must be a Jew."

A Canadian diplomat visited Sampson, but he was useless. "I learned that this individual actually considered me to be guilty of the crimes of which the Saudis had accused me."

Confessions of an Innocent Man unfolds almost like a thriller. This is a remarkable book written by a man who has seen the dark underbelly of a rigid, intolerant Islamic society.

It should be read by anyone who cares about the deplorable state of human rights in Arab countries today.

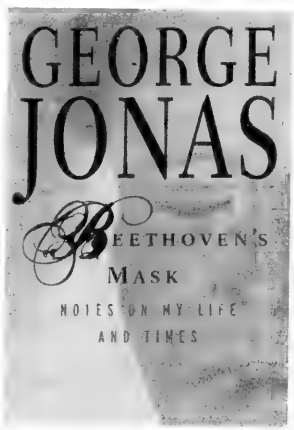
Jonas speaks his mind in a pungent memoir

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto newspaper columnist and author George Jonas arrived in Canada in 1956, following the Soviet invasion of his birthplace, Hungary.

Jonas drove a cab before being offered a staff position at CBC's national script department. By 1971, after having been a script editor and a chief story editor, he was a television producer.



Not bad for a newly arrived immigrant whose first language was not even English.

He also wrote books, including an international best-seller, Vengeance, upon which Steven Spielberg's new film Munich is based.

And in collaboration with local lawyer Edward Greenspan, he produced the acclaimed TV series, Scales of Justice. Of late, he has been a nationally syndicated columnist for CanWest News Service and the National Post.

He has had quite a life, and in Beethoven's Mask (Key Porter Books), he rehashes it in a pungent, somewhat sardonic memoir full of his politically conservative views on historical and current events.

Of Jewish origin, Jonas comes from a highly assimilated family that converted to Christianity.

"As a result, I grew up in a family that was not even nominally Jewish," he writes. "My grandparents and my mother were Lutherans, my father a Calvinist, my aunt and uncle Roman Catholics. Only Hitler and his followers continued to regard us as Jewish."

In fact, the pro-German Hungarian government did regard his family as Jewish. But that did not deter Jonas' father. As he puts it, "Father planned to go through Hitler's unsettled times by having mother and me call ourselves Szabo and himself some other Gentile name."

Thanks to one of his father's casual business acquaintances, his family avoided the fate of hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

"As father explained it, the man who would help save our lives at some risk to his had the traditional prejudices many Gentiles have about Jews, but he also had certain standards. He drew the line at the Ten Commandments."

Strangely enough, Jonas first became aware of the Holocaust after his immigration to Canada. "In Budapest I had no idea that I was witnessing the Holocaust," he observes. "I thought it was just Gentiles killing Jews."

In this book, Jonas occasionally goes out on a limb and falls hard. An example is his fatuous claim that the Holocaust was not the inevitable result of anti-Semitism. Arguing that there is no link between anti-Semitism and genocide, he asserts that "traditional German prejudice against Jews does not, in itself, explain the Nazi Holocaust."

But if anti-Semitism is not the cause of the Holocaust, what is?

Taking issue with Daniel Jonah Goldhagen's thesis in Hitler's Willing Executioners that "eliminationist" anti-Semitism was behind Germany's attempt to to murder European Jews, Jonas writes: "If Germans are not genocidally anti-Semitic today – as indeed they are not – it is because Germans were just situational murderers between 1933 and 1945, as many groups have been at one period or another."

Like the majority of his fellow Hungarian emigres, Jonas did not want to remain in Europe. "It was not only a question of putting some distance between myself and the lands of applied Marxism… I wanted to put a distance between myself and Europe altogether."

His distaste for Marxism stems, in part, from the fact that his father's property was confiscated by the Communist regime. Unemployable, he stayed at home, cooking meals and playing the piano.

In Nazi-occupied Hungary, Jonas' Jewishness was defined by the yellow star sewn on his lapel. Free at last in Canada, he says he first saw the interior of a synagogue when he married writer Barbara Amiel in Rabbi Gunther Plaut's study at Holy Blossom Temple in 1974.

But as he adds, "Jewish continuity was the furthest thing from my mind." The Jewish wedding was Amiel's idea. Although their marriage was of brief duration, he and Amiel – currently Conrad Black's wife – are still friends.

Jonas is bleakly pessimistic about the prospects of peace in the Middle East. He may have inherited his pessimism from his father, who believed that the Arab-Israeli conflict would be a long one: "We will have to fight them [the Palestinians] for a piece of desert for the next 10 generations."

In this combative spirit, Jonas holds that the PLO's "real aim" was to reverse the outcome of the 1948 war, if not the outcome of the 1917 Balfour Declaration.

Rightly or wrongly, Jonas speaks his mind, loudly and clearly, in Beethoven's Mask.

Grain-free cooking: healthy and delicious

APPLE MUFFINS

2 cups almond flour
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
2 McIntosh apples, peeled and coarsely chopped
3 eggs
½ cup applesauce
¼ cup honey

Heat the oven to 325. Line a muffin tin with large baking cups. Combine the almond flour, salt, baking soda and cinnamon in a bowl. Combine the apples, eggs, applesauce, and honey in another bowl. Add the dry ingredients to the wet and mix well. Evenly fill each baking cup with the batter. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes. Makes 12 muffins.

Quick Applesauce

Peel, core and chop 8 sweet apples. Cook them in a large pot with 1 cup water. Simmer until the apples are soft. Drain excess liquid. Mash the apples by hand or purée in blender until smooth. Add cinnamon and honey to taste (optional).

SESAME-DIJON CRACKERS

2½ cups almond flour
1¼ cups grated Parmesan cheese
¼ cup sesame seeds
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. black pepper
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. cayenne pepper
2 eggs
¼ cup dry-curd cottage cheese or cream cheese
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard kosher salt for sprinkling

Combine the almond flour, Parmesan cheese, sesame seeds, salt, black pepper, baking soda and cayenne pepper in a large mixing bowl. Blend the eggs, dry-curd cottage cheese or cream cheese and mustard in a food processor or blender, or by hand until the mixture is very smooth. Add the wet mixture to the dry mixture and combine well by hand.

Divide the dough in half and shape each half into a log. Wrap each log in plastic wrap and roll it back and forth until the log is long and narrow enough to slide into a paper towel tube. Once the dough is in the tube, place your palms on either end of the tube. Shake it from side to side so the cracker dough expands to fill the space. Put the tubes in the freezer until the dough is frozen.

To bake, heat the oven to 325. Remove one tube from the freezer and allow it to sit at room temperature until it's just soft enough to slice, but not too soft, approximately 10 minutes.

To slice, keep the dough in the tube, moving it out of the tube a couple of inches at a time while you slice — this will keep the batter from softening from the warmth of your hands. Slice very thinly with a sharp, thin knife, and place on a generously buttered cookie sheet. You can place them close together – they will not spread. Sprinkle lightly with kosher salt. Bake for 8 minutes.

Remove the pan from the oven and turn the crackers over. Sprinkle again with kosher salt and bake for another 6 minutes. Remove from the oven and allow the crackers to cool on the sheet. Reduce the oven temperature to 170. Once the crackers are cool, return them to the oven for 30 to 60 minutes, until they're entirely crisp. Turn off the heat and let the crackers cool in the oven. Multiple batches can be piled up for crisping on one tray. The reheating ensures crackers will be crisp and stay crisp while stored in an airtight container or bag. Serve these crackers as you would any others, with cheese, dip or pâté. Makes approximately 10 dozen crackers.

CDs perfect for winter evenings

By MORDECHAI BEN DAT and JOSEPH SERGE

Rosanne Agasee
Home At Last

If you are looking for perfect cozy company on a quiet evening when the raindrops are falling against the window and you are in the mood to stay inside, sheltered, protected, warm and comfortable, you should reach for Home At Last, the debut CD of Toronto singer Rosanne Agasee.

Agasee is a musical charmer.

She sings in the best tradition of the jazz lounge bar – easy and smooth. Her voice is as soft as velvet. It caresses even as it carries the poignancy of the poetry of the lyrics she seductively interprets.

Her soft, jazzy stylings are a delight and her renditions of music of the masters, including Irving Berlin, George and Ira Gershwin and Harold Arlen are remarkably fresh.

But not all the tunes are familiar, and this is one of the strengths of the CD, for it richly demonstrates the deftness and maturity of Agasee's unique interpretative skill.

Her rendition of Gershwin's I Love You, Porgy is evocative and true to all that we hope for in that pained though optimistic ballad. In contrast, Tomorrow We'll See by Gordon Sumner is a narrative of raw emotion telling a lonely, though compelling story that we seldom hear in song.

Rosanne Agasee's Home At Last is a musically engaging way to relax on any night, not only a rainy night.

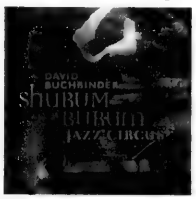
David Buchbinder
Shurum Burum Jazz Circus

David Buchbinder's debut solo album, Shurum Burum Jazz Circus, is a highly enjoyable collection of 12 original songs – many of them based on his jazz-driven circus extravaganza performed at the Distillery District in Toronto last year.



Buchbinder's been around for more than 20 years in various musical projects including the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and Medina. On this CD, he ventures into a funky fusion of jazz and swing that also blends Middle Eastern traditions and, at the same time, pays homage to early '50s bop.

Buchbinder, who plays trumpet and flugelhorn on this CD, simply wails. His trumpet leaps out above the rhythm behind it and dances its way through your living room.

He is backed by an impressive 11-piece ensemble of horn players, percussionists, pianists and cellists. The highly energetic songs are innovative and very entertaining.

Michael Hunter Ochs and Cantor Daniel Leanse
Gesher

Gesher is the Hebrew word for bridge. And this CD, a collaboration by award-winning songwriter Michael Hunter Ochs and Cantor Daniel Leanse, is a literal bridge connecting tradition and modernity, Sabbath songs and prayers and soulful music, spiritual estrangement and spiritual proximity, and even old and young.

The CD is a collection of songs and prayers from the Sabbath liturgy and day of rest experience rendered with humility and musical creativity.

Through their music, Ochs and Leanse are encouraging individuals of all religious and non-religious backgrounds to find new pathways – specifically musical pathways – to the traditions of our forebears.

Their music is magnetic. It pulls at the heart with an imaginative, eclectic array of engaging arrangements of the tunes and melodies that many of us have heard on Shabbat at home and in synagogue. They have also invested a number of other musicians and singers to participate in some of the recordings.

From the lively, infectious enthusiasm of Mi Chamocha to the beautifully sung duet with Alana Grace in V'shamru, the full orchestration and full harmonies of Shalom Rav and the gospel sounds of Oseh Shalom, the CD rings with hope and optimism and a happy, respectful resonance of men's and women's voices for the tradition-laden sounds of Shabbat.

The quality of Gesher's music is excellent, an echo and reminder of the folksong idealism of the 1960s. The production values of the CD are the equal of any other.

Either as an introduction to the music of Shabbat or as an affirmation of Shabbat's constantly renewing mysteries and eternal message of peace, Gesher is great listening.

Moshav Band are the keepers of the musical flame

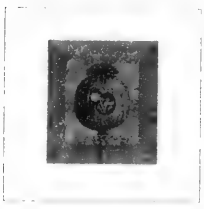
Paris to Kyiv
Fragmenti

Paris to Kyiv is the brainchild of Winnipeg's Alexis Kochan that blends eastern European music with contemporary and world music.

Fragmenti is the group's fourth CD. Characteristically, it is strong on Ukrainian folk, chanting and meditative grooves.



It reminds me in many ways of the music of Stratford, Ont., singer/ songwriter Loreena McKennitt.

Paris to Kyiv includes violist/guitarist Richard Moody and bandurist/sopilka player Julian Kytasty. Also partnering on this project is overtone singing artist Aloan Schroeder.

The songs are soothing and melodic and weave a dreamy tapestry. Like McKennitt, Kochan's voice is simply beautiful.

The 17 songs are a mixture of original compositions and ancient ritual songs. This eclectic fusion of ancient sounds and modern instruments is highly enjoyable.

The Best of Moshav Band:
Higher and Higher

Rock, reggae, country, folk, Israeli and North American music come alive with the famed, fabulously fused sounds of the Moshav Band.

The renowned trio are the rock stars of today's Jewishly plugged-in college campus students. In a very real sense, the Moshav Band are the keepers of the musical flame ignited by the late Shlomo Carlebach, though their music, in some cases, bears only scant resemblance to the wistful, raspy-voiced stirrings of the charismatic singing rabbi.

The band traces its mid-1990s beginnings to Moshav Meor Modi'in where they were raised and where the late singing rabbi lived during his visits to Israel. Carlebach's stirring melodies were as familiar to them when they were growing up as the faces of the countless stars high above them in the sky at night.

And, as any of the group's followers and admirers will attest, the band's sometimes raucous, sometimes peaceful, always thoughtful, energetic music overwhelms the sensations with waves of powerful emotion.

This CD is primarily a collection of some of the most popular songs with which the group has won over the hearts of so many of our children, for whom Jewish identity is also an exciting portal to the wide possibilities of self-expression through contemporary music of all kinds.

Blackfield
Blackfield

A few years ago, Israeli solo artist Aviv Geffen, a popular singer with a number of gold albums in Israel, met English neo-progressive rock maestro Steve Wilson on a London to Tel Aviv flight.

The duo started a close friendship and soon collaborated on this amazing album.

Geffen had been a fan of Wilson's innovative progressive sounding group Porcupine Tree, and jumped at the chance to work with him.

The result is the eponymously named Blackfield, a collection of 10 innovative, yet highly accessible songs.

Most of the songs are slow and melodic at first, but then explode into a raunchy, distorted ending. Fans of Coldplay, Radiohead and Pink Floyd will find this album staying in their CD player for a long time.

It's been in regular rotation on mine for over a year. A highly under-rated gem.

BIG BAND SOUND FOR CHANUKAH SONGS

Philadelphia-born California Cantor Kenny Ellis has delightfully adapted the traditional Chanukah songs to the broad, swinging sounds of the big bands of the 1940's and 1950's. His renditions evoke memories of the stylings of the generation of such great singers as Frank Sinatra, Mel Torme, Ella Fitzgerald and Peggy Lee.

CHICKEN PROVENÇAL ON ENOKI 'PASTA'

4 to 6 packages enoki mushrooms (one package per serving)
2 lbs. boneless, skinless chicken thighs
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup chopped onion
6 garlic cloves, chopped
1 tsp. red pepper flakes
4 cups chopped fresh plum tomatoes
¼ cup tomato paste
1 cup white wine
¼ cup chopped Italian parsley
2 cups tomato juice
salt and black pepper to taste

Cut the base off the mushrooms and rinse gently if necessary to remove any dirt above the root ends. Separate the strands of mushrooms and pile them into individual bowls. Pound the chicken between waxed paper with a mallet or heavy frying pan to ¼-in. thickness. Season the chicken with salt and pepper.

In a medium-sized frying pan, with a bit of oil, cook each piece of chicken on high heat until browned and just cooked through. Remove from the frying pan and keep warm.

Heat the 2 tbsp. oil in a large cooking pot over medium heat. Add the onions, garlic, and red pepper flakes and sauté for 5 minutes, until tender and starting to brown. Add the chopped tomatoes, tomato paste, wine, and parsley. Boil for 2 minutes to cook out the alcohol. Add the tomato juice and boil uncovered for 2 to 3 minutes.

Taste, and season with salt and pepper. Slice the chicken into thin strips and add it to the sauce. Let it warm through. Divide the sauce among the bowls, placing it on top of the mushroom "pasta." Serve immediately. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

LATKES

3 cups shredded zucchini
1 medium-sized cauliflower
1 white onion, chopped oil for frying
2 eggs, beaten
salt and black pepper to taste

Provençale potato latkes with red pepper relish as seen in Jeff Nathan's Familiy Suppers, Clarkson Potter, publishers.

Place the zucchini in a tea towel and twist. Wring out as much water as you can. Cut the cauliflower into florets and steam until soft. Drain, cool and mash. Squeeze the liquid from the cauliflower as you did with the zucchini.

Heat a bit of oil in a medium frying pan over low heat. Add the onions and cook until caramelized, about 5 to 10 minutes.

Combine the zucchini, cauliflower and onions in a bowl. Add the eggs, salt and pepper. Mix with your hands to blend evenly. Place a non-stick frying pan over medium heat and add enough oil to cover the bottom. When it's hot, spoon the mixture in by heaping tablespoons. Remember, the only ingredient in this recipe that has to be cooked is the egg, so they don't have to cook for long. Turn them over when browned to your liking. These can be made ahead of time and reheated uncovered in a 250 oven. Serve with yogurt and/or applesauce. Makes 1 to 2 dozens.

Variations: Mushroom Latkes

Add 5 thinly sliced, medium-sized mushrooms. Cook them with the onions and add them to the cauliflower and zucchini mixture.

Baked Latkes

If you don't want to deep-fry these latkes, the entire mixture can be baked in a large loaf pan or muffin tins at 350 for 20 minutes. They're delicious either way.

CHANUKAH Food Ideas

Kosher cuisine goes mainstream

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jeffrey Nathan, cookbook author, kosher restaurateur, food columnist and television host, believes that eating kosher is a lifestyle, not a cuisine.

As executive chef of Abigael's, a midtown New York kosher restaurant, Nathan says he prepares dishes that just happen to be kosher.

"I serve modern food with global influences. Keeping it kosher is not the challenge."

Speaking at Kosherfest 2005, the annual foodservice trade show held at New York's Jacob Javits Convention Center, Nathan said that because almost any dish can be turned kosher, it's hard to figure out what kosher cuisine really is.

"Kosher consumers are demanding. Foodwise, they want to be on the same level as everyone else."

The huge variety of items at Kosherfest attests to that, he says. "Every year, people in the food industry see what's going on [at this show] and they want to be part of the market."

In that vein, he said, he would like to see kosher go completely mainstream.

"Kosher food should be desegregated in the marketplace. Why should a box of specialty rice that just happens to be kosher be kept in its own section? Consumers should be able to shop the whole store and seek items they want.

"People would buy items they had never before bought because those items would be alongside their regular items."

In his new book Jeff Nathan's Family Suppers, More than 125 Simple Kosher Recipes, he said, he offers readers recipes that are family friendly, creative and diverse. "Kids need food they like to eat. If they like it and ask for it again, and it just happens to be kosher, what could be better?"

As well as offering recipes whose ingredients are readily available, Nathan shares preparation tips and cooking projects in which the whole family can get involved.

"I want people to eat home-cooked meals. They're healthy, they're interesting, and they're prepared with love. Heating up food in a microwave is not cooking, it's reheating."

APPLE LATKES

1½ cups all-purpose flour
½ cup granulated sugar
¼ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground allspice
¾ cup water
2 firm apples, such as Golden Delicious, Fuji or Granny Smith, unpeeled ½ cup canola oil, as needed confectioners' sugar, for sprinkling

Whisk the flour, sugar, baking powder, cinnamon and allspice in a medium bowl. Whisk in the water until barely smooth.

Core the apples and cut into ¼-inch dice. Immediately fold the diced apples into the batter. Line a baking sheet with a double thickness of paper towels. Heat the oil over high heat until it begins to shimmer. Reduce the heat to medium. Working in batches, using about ⅓ cup for each latke, pour the batter into the skillet. Cook until the underside is golden brown, about 1½ minutes, adjusting the heat as needed so the latkes don't burn. Turn and cook the other side.

Transfer to the paper towels to drain briefly. It is best to serve each batch immediately after draining. If you wish, use two skillets to keep them coming at a fast pace. Sprinkle the latkes with confectioners' sugar. Serve at once, with sour cream passed on the side. Makes 4 to 5 servings.

CHICKEN IN SWEET-AND-SOUR SAUCE

½ cup sugar
½ cup water
⅓ cup plus 1 tbsp. rice wine vinegar
1 tbsp. ketchup
1 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tbsp. peeled and finely chopped fresh ginger
3 garlic cloves, finely chopped
1 tbsp. cornstarch
⅔ cup cornstarch, as needed
⅓ cup canola oil, or more as needed
6 7-oz. boneless, skinless chicken breasts, each cut into 3 pieces
1 tbsp. finely chopped fresh ginger
1 garlic clove, finely chopped
1½ cups packed coarsely chopped napa cabbage
1 cup packed coarsely chopped bok choy
1 medium red bell pepper, cored, seeded, and diced
1 tsp. dark Asian sesame oil hot cooked rice, for serving

To make the sweet-and-sour sauce, bring the sugar, water, rice vinegar, ketchup, soy sauce, ginger and garlic to a boil in a small saucepan over medium heat, stirring often.

Reduce the heat to low and simmer to blend the flavours, about 3 minutes. Sprinkle the 1 tbsp. cornstarch over 2 tbsp. water in a small bowl and stir with a fork to dissolve.

Whisk the cornstarch mixture into the simmering sauce and cook to thicken, about 1 minute. Remove from the heat.

For the rest of the dish, spread the ⅔ cup cornstarch in a shallow dish.

Heat the oil in a very large skillet over medium-high heat until very hot but not smoking.

Coat the chicken in the cornstarch and shake off the excess. Add the chicken to the skillet, working in batches if necessary. Cook, turning once, until golden brown, about 3 minutes. Transfer the chicken to a plate. Add more oil to the skillet, if needed, and heat.

Add the ginger and garlic to the skillet and cook until the garlic gives off its aroma, about 1 minute. Add the cabbage, bok choy and bell pepper and mix well. Return the chicken to the skillet. Reduce the heat to low and simmer until the chicken is cooked through, about 10 minutes. Stir in the sweet-and-sour sauce and bring to a simmer. Remove from the heat and stir in the sesame oil. Serve hot, with the rice. Makes 4 servings.

THE NATHAN FAMILY MEAT LOAF

1 cup dried plain bread crumbs
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley
1 large egg plus 3 large egg yolks
3 tbsp. onion powder
6 garlic cloves, finely chopped, plus 3 garlic cloves, cut in half crosswise
1 tbsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. dried basil
1 tsp. freshly ground black pepper, plus more for gravy
3 lbs. ground beef
1 medium onion, thickly sliced
¼ cup all-purpose flour
1 quart chicken broth kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Position a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat the oven to 350. Lightly oil a flameproof roasting pan. To make the meat loaves, mix the bread crumbs, ½ cup water, parsley, egg and yolk, onion powder, chopped garlic, oregano, basil and pepper in a large bowl.

Add the beef, and use your hands to quickly mix everything together, just until barely combined. Do not overmix, or the meat loaf will be heavy. Scatter the sliced onion and garlic halves in the bottom of the roasting pan to flavour the gravy.

Form the meat mixture into two loaves, each about 8 in. long and 3 in. wide, and place on top of the onions and garlic. Bake, uncovered, until meat loaves show no sign of pink when prodded in the centre with the tip of a knife (about 165 on a meat thermometer), about 45 minutes. Transfer the meat loaves to a serving platter.

Place the roasting pan with the onions, garlic and pan drippings over 2 burners on medium-high heat. Sprinkle the flour into the pan and whisk to make a paste that is chunky with the onions and garlic. Whisk in the broth and bring to a boil, whisking occasionally. Reduce the heat to medium-low and simmer until the gravy thickens, about 5 minutes.

Season the gravy with salt and pepper. Strain the gravy into a bowl, or serve it with the onions and garlic intact. Slice the meat loaf and serve hot, with the gravy passed on the side. Makes 2 meat loaves, 4 to 6 servings each.

CHICKEN AND MUSHROOM FRICASSEE

⅓ cup vegetable oil, such as canola
10 thin-sliced chicken cutlets freshly ground black pepper to taste
¼ cup sliced shallots (about 3 large shallots)
6 garlic cloves, finely chopped
1½ lbs. assorted fresh mushrooms, cut into quarters
¼ cup all-purpose flour
2 cups chicken broth
1 cup dry white wine, such as Chardonnay
3 tbsp. chopped fresh herbs, such as parsley, rosemary and basil, in any combination kosher salt to taste hot cooked egg noodles, for serving

Heat the oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Season the chicken with pepper. In batches, without crowding, add the chicken to the skillet and cook, turning once, until lightly browned on both sides, about 4 minutes. Transfer the browned chicken to a plate.

Return all of the browned chicken to the skillet. Add the shallots and garlic, being sure they touch the bottom of the skillet, and cook for 1 minute. Add the mushrooms and cook until they release their liquid and are beginning to brown, about 10 minutes.

Sprinkle with the flour and stir well. Cook, stirring often, for 1 minute, adjusting the heat as needed to ensure that the flour doesn't brown. Add the broth and wine, stirring to release the browned bits in the pan. Bring to a simmer.

Reduce the heat to medium-low and simmer until the chicken is cooked through, about 15 minutes. Stir in the herbs and season the sauce with salt and pepper. Serve hot, on the noodles. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

CHANUKAH FOOD IDEAS

You don't need potatoes to make latkes

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

When it comes to latkes, it's not the potatoes that are important, it's the oil.

Symbolic of the cleansing and rededication of the temple in Jerusalem, the one day's supply of oil that miraculously lasted eight days has inspired chefs to create a myriad of fabulous fried foods to celebrate the holiday. While the potato is the veggie of choice, there are a number of other options and variables that can go into the perfect pancake.

CLASSIC POTATO LATKES

2 lb. russet potatoes
1 onion
2 eggs, lightly beaten
2 tbsp. flour
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
vegetable oil for frying
sour cream and applesauce for topping

Preheat oven to 200. Peel and grate the potatoes. (This can be done in a food processor, but the texture is better if done by hand.) Place the grated potatoes in a colander with a plate beneath it. Sprinkle salt on the potatoes, cover them with a layer of paper towels, and then place a heavy object (such as a heavy bowl or can) on top. Allow the potatoes to drain for 10 minutes.

While the potatoes are draining, peel the onion and grate it by hand. Set aside. In a large bowl, combine the potatoes, onion, eggs and flour and season generously with salt and pepper. Mix well. In a large, heavy skillet, add oil to a depth of about 1/4 in. and heat over medium-high heat. Drop 1/4 cup of the potato mixture into the hot oil, flattening with a spatula.

Fry the latkes until deep brown and crispy on both sides. Drain the latkes on paper towels (pat them with the towels on both sides) and keep them warm in a single layer on a baking sheet in the oven until all of them have been made. Serve hot, with sour cream and applesauce on the side. Makes 12 to 14 latkes.

EGGPLANT LATKES

2 large eggplants, each about 1 1/2 lb.
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 large onion, chopped
3 eggs, lightly beaten
1/2 cup matzah meal
1 1/2 tsp. salt, or to taste ground pepper to taste
vegetable oil for frying

Preheat the broiler. Prick the eggplants all over with a fork and broil them until their skin is charred and they are soft inside, about 25 minutes, turning them once. While the eggplants are broiling, heat the oil in a medium skillet over medium heat. Add the onion and cook, stirring often, until soft and lightly coloured. Remove from heat and set aside.

Remove eggplants from the broiler and let cool. When cool, cut the eggplants in half lengthwise and peel the skin away from the pulp. Discard the seeds, skin and stem and place the pulp in a medium bowl. Chop it finely.

Place the eggplant and onion in a large bowl. Add the eggs, matzah meal, salt and pepper and stir to combine. (If necessary, add more matzah meal to create a batter that holds together.)

Preheat oven to 200. Lightly oil a large nonstick skillet or griddle over medium heat. Drop a heaping tablespoon of the eggplant batter onto the hot skillet or griddle, making a pancake about 3 inches in diameter. Fry until golden brown on both sides (about 3 minutes per side) and then place on a baking sheet in the oven. Repeat until all of the eggplant batter has been used, re-oiling the fry surface as necessary to keep the latkes from sticking. Serve warm with sour cream. Makes 16 to 18 latkes depending on size.

SWEET POTATO LATKES

2 medium to large-sized sweet potatoes, scrubbed
2 small white baking potatoes, peeled, or two red russet potatoes, scrubbed
1 green onion
1/2 cup grated red apple, skin left on
2 large egg
2 to 3 tbsp. flour
1/2 tsp. cinnamon pinch nutmeg
oil for frying
pecans, chopped (optional)
apple butter (optional)
sour cream (optional)

Coarsely grate all the potatoes using a cheese grater. Make the white potato slightly finer than the sweet potato. Finely chop the green onion, using only the dark green part at the top. Place a clean dish cloth on the counter top. Place the chopped apple, onion and potatoes on top of the cloth. Fold the cloth up and twist it so the water comes out. (Do all of this quickly because the white potato and the apple will turn brown after about 15 minutes.) Place the mixture in a bowl and add the egg and flour. Mix to combine.

Heat 1/4 inch of oil in a skillet. Using a big spoon, drop tablespoons of the latke batter onto the hot oil. Use the back of the spoon to press lightly on the latke to flatten it. You may want to coat the spoon with flour before you do this so it doesn't stick. Cook the latke for about 4 minutes, turn it, cook for another 2 minutes or so. This is really important because you want the latke to be soft and sweet inside but a little crunchy on the outside. When it looks as though it might be in danger of being burned, that's when you take it out. Drain it on a paper towel and serve with apple butter, chopped pecans and sour cream. Serves 4.

Police chief meets with Hamilton Jews

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Hamilton Police Chief Brian Mullan and several of his key officers met with members of the local Jewish community earlier this month in one of a series of consultations meant to address the concerns of various sectors of the city's diverse population.

The Dec. 1 meeting, held at Temple Anshe Sholom, aimed to get public input and feedback on police services, as well as to answer questions and address community concerns.

A day earlier, the chief met with members of the Muslim community at a local mosque. So far this fall, Mullan has met with the Hindu, aboriginal, gay, black and East Asian communities, and he has held neighbourhood meetings on local concerns.

The forum at the temple came after Mullan had to defend a visit he made to Israel last March, along with about 30 other Ontario law enforcement officials and politicians, to take part in training sessions on dealing with terrorism.

The Canadian Coalition Against Racism, the Niagara Palestinian Association and the McMaster University chapter of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights were among the groups that complained to the Hamilton Police Services Board about the visit.

The chief vigorously defended his right to go on the trip, which had been approved by the board.

After a raucous public meeting on the issue that ended up being adjourned amid chaos, the board considered written submissions from both sides and ultimately dismissed the complaints.

At Temple Anshe Shalom, Mullan gave a statistical analysis of crime in the city – such as drug-related offences, break and enters and street gang activity – and he noted that most categories of crime are either down or static compared to previous years.

He noted that Hamilton has had the largest recent reduction in overall crime of any Canadian city with a population of 100,000 or more.

But hate crimes are one area where there has been an increase, mostly in mischief-related crimes such as graffiti and desecration of cemeteries.

Mullan said police recognize that Jewish communities across the country are a target for hate crimes.

"It's very difficult for us to arrest those responsible," he said. "They do it in the middle of the night, in the dark, in obscure areas. And once we get those people, the sentencing we get is minimal."

Police efforts have been centred on prosecution of hate groups and, most importantly, the education of school-age kids, Mullan said.

Regarding more serious crimes such as the firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs library in Montreal last year and the 2002 arson at Congregation Anshei Minsk in downtown Toronto, the police were asked how aware they are of potential threats to shuls and other community buildings, especially during the High Holy Days and events with large crowds.

Mullan said police have increased patrols during those times.

But equally important, he said, is the work police are doing with opposing groups to bring down the level of local animosity.

Gerald Fisher, executive director of UJA Federation of Hamilton, praised the good relationship that the federation has with police, who he said are quick to respond to the federation's concerns.

House calls were Hamilton doctor's trademark

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Phil Yanover, a family physician for 47 years died Nov. 29 at age 73.

Obituary

He received his medical degree from Queen's University. His medical practice was marked by a very personal relationship with his patients, which often led him to perform caring acts that went far beyond the call of duty.

He made house calls long after they had become a thing of the past.

Mollie Eisenberg tells a typical story. Her husband Saul was very ill, and Yanover came to their house. Saul needed to go to the hospital, and his wife was arranging to take him. Yanover told her, "I'm going to the hospital anyway. I'll take him and get him admitted, and call you afterwards."

Perhaps the ultimate house call story comes from Bill and Bella Ginsberg, who both became ill while in Florida once.

Bill was recovering from a stroke at the couple's condominium in Miami when Bella also suffered a debilitating stroke. Both needed round-the-clock nursing care, and the family appealed to Yanover for help.

What followed was like a military operation. Yanover took a 7 a.m. flight to Miami on a Saturday morning. He had arranged for ambulances to bring the couple to the airport, had three seats removed to accommodate Bella on a stretcher, and, accompanied by a nurse, they returned to Canada.

That Saturday night, Bella was admitted to the McMaster University Medical Centre and Bill returned to the couple's Hamilton home.

At Yanover's funeral, the overflow crowd at Beth Jacob Synagogue, where Yanover was a longtime member, included not only family and friends, but many patients.

Yanover had a lifelong love affair with Sandra, his wife of 48 years. They raised three sons, David, Michael and Paul, whom he always made time to be with despite his busy schedule.

His daughters-in-law Helen, Rhonda and Carolyn received special affection because he had no daughters of his own. Six grandchildren – Jordan, Carly, Rachel, Emily, Isabella and Hannah – were a constant delight.

No tribute to Yanover would be complete without reference to his love of fun and his wicked sense of humour.

All three of his sons gave emotional eulogies at his funeral, but Paul told one story that brought smiles to all faces.

An executive with the Walt Disney Company, Paul had invited his father down to a dinner and dance in New York City to mark the premiere of the 1997 animated movie Hercules, and actress Jennifer Aniston was at one of the tables.

All the young men in attendance were somewhat awed and deferential. But Yanover went over and started talking to the star, and soon they were dancing together.

Yanover was active in the Jewish community and served as president of the Council of Jewish Organizations in the early 1970s.

Vote on MDA full admission planned for March

Al-Hadid, a 52-year-old doctor who has been president of the Jordan Red Crescent society for 14 years, became a trusted intermediary between Israelis and Palestinians through the McGill program. Founded in 1998, it trains Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian social workers at McGill, who continue to cooperate after they go home through the program's five community-service centres in their three jurisdictions. The Jordan Red Crescent is one of the program's six partners in the region.

"It was the intervention of Mohammed, a Jordanian and a Muslim, particularly in the Arab world, that helped win the day," said the program's director, Prof. Jim Torczyner.

"This is grassroots diplomacy. The Jewish community needs to understand that there are people like this among the younger generation of Arab leadership, and we can work with them."

"I am not a politician," said Al-Hadid, who had to be persuaded by Torczyner to talk about his role. "I believe in humanitarian values, and I know MDA does, too. I am convinced they want to be part of the movement and to play by the rules."

Al-Hadid formed relationships with Israelis through a program and became more sensitive to the MDA issue. Torczyner introduced him to the Israeli ambassador to Amman, and soon after Al-Hadid made his first visit to Israel.

On the strength of these relationships, Al-Hadid was sought as a mediator of disputes between the PRC and the Israelis on several occasions.

Soon after the start of the intifadah in 2000, the president of the PRC and about 10 of his colleagues travelling in PRC ambulances were stopped by Israeli soldiers and detained, on suspicion that the vehicles were being used to smuggle weapons.

The PRC asked Al-Hadid to intervene with Israel to get them released. He called the Israeli ambassador in Amman, as well as the president of MDA and friends in the Israeli foreign ministry. About four hours later, the PRC officials were let go.

Another time, the PRC contacted Al-Hadid when the Israelis would not allow trucks carrying medical supplies to travel to hospitals in Gaza. Once again, with a few phone calls, the trucks were waved through.

Instances like this went a long way in building up his credibility in the Arab world, he said.

The international federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent societies is expected to convene in March in Geneva to vote on the MDA's full admission, and Al-Hadid said his work will not be complete until that happens.

Al-Hadid believes the conflict between Israelis and Arabs is "one of the greatest tragedies of our time" and that these "two Semitic peoples who believe in the same God" should live in harmony, as they have historically.

As he said at a lecture at McGill a little more than a year ago, "the Middle East, birthplace of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, could be a real paradise if we could only take away all the aggravation, craziness, stubbornness, revenge and retaliation, and replace it with tolerance, sanity, logic, commitment to understand each other."

W. Bank college seeks university status

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Since the Israeli cabinet voted to support a proposal to upgrade the College of Judea and Samaria to university status last May, the goal of turning the school into one of Israel's leading institutions of higher learning is likely to become a reality.

Established in 1982, the college, with a population of about 9,000 students, is located in Ariel, in the West Bank just 40 kilometres east of Tel Aviv.

In 1978, 40 families settled in the area and since then the population has grown to about 20,000.

The College of Judea and Samaria is the largest public college with a student body that is representative of the diversity in Israel, said Adina Abramov, the school's Canadian representative.

"The college is very inclusive," she said.

"There is a very large Arab student body, which is very unique. Ironically, you would think that because the school is in an area that is a hotbed of political activity, so close to so many Arab towns… But students from those towns are coexisting and learning together with Israelis, students from overseas, religious and non-religious students in harmony."

If the government accepts Education Minister Limor Livnat's proposal to officially recognize the college as a university, the school will be able to issue postgraduate degrees and will be able to apply for more government funding to further its scientific research.

While the college's academic qualifications are currently being reviewed by the Council of Higher Education, Abramov said that the school's officials expect the status to be changed this academic year.

"The standard of education there is really that of a university. It offers world-class technological research," Abramov said.

"They are co-operating on so many different research projects with universities around the world. Whether it is mechanics, or technology, or the field of medicine, they are doing cutting-edge research right now."

One of the most exciting projects that the college is taking on is the study of "functional foods."

The program, which formally began in February, offers students an understanding of food and nutrition as a way of preventing disease and even treating behavioural disorders.

The college also has a mechanical engineering department that developed an autonomous robotic rover program sponsored by the Israel Space Agency.

But Abramov is worried that the reputation and accomplishments of the college may be marred by the negative perceptions of the school's location and the ideologies of the people who support it.

The college, which is chaired by Moshe Arens, the former Israeli defence minister, is described as a Zionist institution.

According to its website, "each student must study one course per semester on some aspect of Judaism, Jewish heritage or Land of Israel studies, and the Israeli flag must be displayed in every classroom, laboratory and auditorium on campus."

Abramov insists, however, that while the school is Zionist, the main focus is on academics.

"This is a purely academic institution. The only thing that makes it Zionist is the location. There are the main supporters, the ones who are very staunch Zionists, who do want to strengthen that part of the land and their consideration is purely a Zionistic one, but then you have the scientific supporters who are interested in the advancements that are coming out of that college," she said.

"You have the people who love science and want to be at the forefront of the new scientific developments."

Many Canadians are also interested in seeing Israel lead the technological and scientific world, said Abramov.

"The idea is that it seems there is a growing interest among Canadians about Israel and Israeli scientific developments."

Israeli band fills club with spiritual sounds

By RACHEL ALBERT
Special to The CJN

Overpowering the mind-numbing death metal from the bar next door, the world-renowned Israeli band Reva L'sheva (Quarter to Seven) recently filled The Reverb club in downtown Toronto with spiritual sounds.

Organized by The House with partners Canada Israel Experience and Hillel, the event was widely publicized and thus well attended by people of all ages.

The House, an organization for university-aged students and upper-level high school students, aims to provide a comfortable environment for students to explore their Judaism through various programs. It has sponsored several events featuring Reva L'sheva as well as other local bands, including the evening's opening act Kol Tuv.

Kol Tuv got the night started with its renditions of familiar Israeli melodies, which they played in an up-beat, modern, '90s-rock style.

Reva L'sheva combines a unique blend of folk, funk, rock and blues with beautiful Jewish-related lyrics, often inspired by the late Shlomo Carlebach. The band played some of their classics, including One Love (Ahavat Chinam) and For Us (Ken Tehiyeh Lanu), as well as songs from their new album, There We Will Sing (Ve'sham Nashir).

Yehuda Katz is a member of the Israeli band Reva L'sheva, which played at a recent concert organized by The House, Canada Israel Experience and Hillel.

The man behind the success of The House, Rabbi Rafi Lipner, was pleased with the evening.

"The nicest thing about the concert, which is really what The House is all about, was that it didn't feel like one big 'club-bing' atmosphere which happened to have had Jews. It felt more like [the] dancing [one sees] in the streets of Jerusalem on Independence Day," he said.

The House is always looking to feature local Jewish bands. For more information, visit www.checkoutthehouse.com. For more information about Reva L'sheva, visit www.revalsheva.com.

New girls' yeshiva opens in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi Elie Mayer graduated from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) in 1993, he spent 1½ years in Israel before returning to Canada to attend York University.

Of his classmates, fewer than a dozen took part in an Israel program that year.

Last year, however, 41 of 299 graduating CHAT students headed to Israel to participate in one-year programs. About three-quarters of them attended yeshivot, according to CHAT's director of education Paul Shaviv.

Earlier this month, Rabbi Mayer visited his old high school and the Hebrew Academy of Montreal as part of a three-week tour to promote the fledgling women's yeshiva he co-founded earlier this year outside of Jerusalem.

Rabbi Elie Mayer

The Tiferet Center for Advanced Torah Studies for Women is located in Ramat Beit Shemesh, 40 minutes from Israel's capital, and has 48 students this year. Most are American or British; two are Torontonians. All have "a significant religious background," he said.

To Rabbi Mayer's surprise, he and Rabbi Azriel Rosner, his co-dean and the school's co-founder, had to turn away more than 150 applicants before Tiferet opened.

"There is no doubt that the idea of a year's study in Israel has become part of the rite of passage of many Jewish school leavers, particularly from the more traditional communities," said Shaviv, a native of England who has been involved in the Jewish education field in Canada since 1994.

Among the trends in post-high school yeshiva education are a growing number of programs for girls and the emergence of "what are known as American yeshivot, which tend to deliver their programs totally in English," said Shaviv.

Tiferet fits neatly into that profile. Most of its 19 faculty members are olim.

"We realized there weren't enough girls' schools [to meet a growing demand]," said Rabbi Mayer.

"I think people have seen the benefits of how [a year in Israel is] an opportunity before you start college to get to know yourself, find out who you are and what's important to you," said Rabbi Mayer in an interview while he was in town. "Studying and touring the land is very big in terms of getting perspective on your life, what you want to be and who you are."

Returning to university is "pretty much a given" at his school. With that in mind, Tiferet offers weekly workshops on "Combating anti-Semitism and anti-Israel propaganda."

Rabbi Mayer said he and Rabbi Rosner "both felt it was important. Since the intifadah, it's not just at a few campuses. It's all over."

As a student at York in the mid-1990s, Rabbi Mayer – now the father of five children ranging in age from 3 to 8 – quickly honed his own advocacy skills. "I was a political science major. I took [a course called] War and Peace in the Middle East. I had a debate every day with Palestinian or pro-Palestinian students in the class, many of whom were extremely supportive of suicide bombing in Israel. There were Palestinian student groups who would put up maps of the Middle East with no Israel... there was a lot of misinformation and anti-Semitism.

"When you go to a campus... a Jew, whether he likes it or not, represents Israel and needs to know how to respond."

But the main reason Rabbi Mayer became involved in education and Tiferet was because he wanted to transmit the feeling he gained during his yeshiva experience that Judaism was "exciting and real and relevant."

Although he came from an observant home – an alumnus of Camp Moshava, he met his wife Melanie at a Bnei Akiva shabbaton when he was 15 – his time at Beit Midrash L'Torah yeshiva "impacted me like no other experience I've ever had."

Jewish law students meet in Ottawa

At the Canadian Jewish Law Students' Association's 19th annual conference, from Jan. 13 to 15 in Ottawa, students from across the country will gather to explore the theme "Tikkun Olam: Creating a Better World."

Guest speakers at the conference, to be held at the Chateau Laurier, will discuss how the legal profession can advance social justice, among other topics.

Scheduled speakers include Terry Beitner, director and general counsel of the Canadian justice department's war crimes and crimes against humanity unit; New York Sun and Jerusalem Post columnist Daniel Pipes; Bruce Elman, dean of the law faculty at the University of Windsor; Warren Kinsella, former Liberal party adviser and author; Igor Ellyn, Toronto Sun law columnist and member of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists; Canadian Jewish Congress president and University of Toronto law professor Ed Morgan; Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker; Quebec Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman; and federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler.

In addition to panel and roundtable discussions, the conference includes a Kabbalat Shabbat, gala dinner, parliamentary cocktail evening, and informal get-togethers. All meals are certified kosher by the Ottawa Vaad HaKashrut.

Canadian Friends of THE KOBY MANDELL FOUNDATION

Our Canadian Branch Office is now open

Established by Rabbi Seth and Sherri Mandell after their 13-year old son Koby was murdered by terrorists, the Foundation's programs teach others bereaved by terrorism to cope, heal, and grow. Our flagship program, Camp Koby, is a fun and therapeutic summer camp for children 8 to 18 who have lost an immediate family member to terrorism in Israel.

Together we will help the children of Israel to heal their broken hearts.
Donations welcome. Charitable tax receipts given.

Annan criticizes Iran leader for remarks on Shoah, Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan last week expressed shock that Iran's president questioned the extent of the Holocaust and suggested that a Jewish state be set up in Europe.

Annan pointed to a UN General Assembly resolution last month that rejected "any denial of the Holocaust as an historical event, either in full or in part."

He urged all UN members to "combat such denial and to educate their populations about the well established historical facts of the Holocaust, in which one third of the Jewish people were murdered along with countless members of other minorities."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad made his remarks last Thursday in Saudi Arabia, where he was attending an Islamic summit.

In October, Annan criticized Ahmadinejad for calling for Israel to be wiped off the map. Annan said Israel is a UN member with the same rights and obligations as other members and is protected by the UN Charter.

Ahmadinejad's comments were reported by Iran's official IRNA news agency.

"Some European countries insist on saying that Hitler killed millions of innocent Jews in furnaces, and they insist on it to the extent that if anyone proves something contrary to that they condemn that person and throw them in jail," IRNA quoted Ahmadinejad as saying.

"Although we don't accept this claim, if we suppose it is true, we ask the Europeans: Is the killing of innocent Jewish people by Hitler the reason for their support to the occupiers of Jerusalem?"

"If the Europeans are honest they should give some of their provinces in Europe – like in Germany, Austria or other countries – to the Zionists, and the Zionists can establish their state in Europe. You offer part of Europe and we will support it," he added.

The latest comments also provoked quick condemnation.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel called them "totally unacceptable," while British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said, "I condemn them unreservedly. They have no place in civilized political debate."

The UN Security Council unanimously condemned the remarks.

"The members of the Security Council condemn the remarks about Israel and the denial of the Holocaust," the Security Council said in a statement. "The members of the Security Council reaffirm the rights and obligations of the State of Israel as a full and long-standing member of the United Nations."

All 15 Security Council members, including Algeria, signed the statement. A press statement is the weakest form of Security Council disapproval, well short of a resolution.

Earlier in his speech, before making his remarks about the Holocaust, the Iranian president said: "The question is where do those who rule in Palestine as occupiers come from? Where were they born? Where did their fathers live? They have no roots in Palestine, but they have taken the fate of Palestine in their hands?

"Isn't the right to national self-determination one of the principles of the United Nations charter? Why do they deprive Palestinians of this right?" he said.

Raanan Gissin, a spokesperson for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said in Tel Aviv that Ahmadinejad was voicing "the consensus that exists in many circles in the Arab world that the Jewish people… do not have the right to establish a Jewish, democratic state in their ancestral homeland."

"Just to remind Mr. Ahmadinejad, we've been here long before his ancestors were here," Gissin said. "Therefore, we have a birthright to be here in the land of our forefathers and to live here. Thank God we have the capability to deter and to prevent such a statement from becoming a reality."

White House spokesperson Scott McClellan said: "It just further underscores our concerns about the regime in Iran, and it's all the more reason why it's so important that the regime not have the ability to develop nuclear weapons."

In a news conference with French President Jacques Chirac near Berlin, Merkel also said: "With our historical responsibility in mind, I can only say that we reject [Ahmadinejad's comments] in the harshest possible terms.

"We will do everything to make it clear that Israel's right to exist is in no way endangered. I am firmly convinced that a majority in the international community has a similar opinion on this issue," she said.

Chirac said he agreed completely.

On Saturday, German church leaders joined international protests against Ahmadinejad's statements.

Roman Catholic Cardinal Karl Lehmann told the Frankfurter Allgemeine Sonntagszeitung newspaper that he was "outraged," and urged Ahmadinejad to show respect for other nations and religions.

Luthern Church leader Wolfgang Huber said the international community must take action against Iran, but he did not elaborate.

"Whoever denies the historical fact of the murder of millions of Jews during the Third Reich in Germany and denies Israels right to exist has committed incitement," the newspaper quoted Huber as saying.

Religious hardliners in Iran do not publicly deny the Holocaust occurred, but they say its scale has been exaggerated to justify the creation of Israel and continued Western support for it.

Close allies when Iran was ruled by the U.S.-backed Shah, Iran and Israel have become implacable foes since Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution.

Israel accuses Iran of giving arms and funding to militant Palestinian groups such as Islamic Jihad, and of building nuclear weapons. Iran denies the charges.

Tehran calls Israel a "terrorist state" and has developed missiles that can reach Israel. It says it would use them if Israel tried to bomb its nuclear facilities.

Canada votes against Israel at UN again

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Just days after shifting three of its votes to a more pro-Israel stance, Canada last week voted against the Jewish state in seven of 10 resolutions passed by the United Nations General Assembly.

Canada voted with Israel on one measure and abstained on another. A 10th resolution was passed by consensus and required no vote.

The resolutions were part of a package of 20 or so Arab-sponsored measures the session considers over several weeks this time of year.

The Canadian votes represented no change from last year.

Canada voted with the majority on resolutions that addressed the following issues: assistance to Palestinian refugees; persons displaced as a result of the 1967 Six Day War and subsequent hostilities; operations of the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA); Palestinian refugees' property and revenue; the applicability of the 1949 Geneva Conventions to the "occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem"; Israeli settlements in the territories; and the risk of nuclear proliferation in the Middle East.

Canada voted against a resolution on the work of a special committee to investigate Israeli practices affecting Palestinian human rights. Canada was among 10 countries to oppose the measure, which passed anyway.

And Canada abstained on a similarly worded resolution on Israeli practices affecting Palestinian human rights, which also passed easily.

The votes cast last Friday came a week after Gilbert Laurin, Canada's chargé d'affaires at the UN, slammed this year's litany of anti-Israel resolutions as "divisive and unhelpful."

Canada won plaudits in Jewish communal circles for changing three votes from previous years. Two of the votes shifted from Ottawa's customary abstention to opposition, and one from opposition to abstention.

In his remarks to the world body at the time, Laurin called one resolution "unbalanced and unhelpful," and he condemned another for not making a stronger statement against suicide bombings.

The three changes to Canada's votes this year added to Ottawa's shift toward Israel on four other resolutions last year.

Privately, Israel advocates in this country are placing little stock in the latest round of voting, saying Canada's record on Israel at the UN is changing, even if slowly and incrementally.

The earlier shifts were "important and welcome," Marc Gold, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, told The CJN.

"But the root problem remains the structural dysfunction at the UN that Canada has expressed a determination to reform," Gold said. "Until that's done, we will not be and ought not to be satisfied."

Canada has also said it wants fewer, more focused, and more balanced resolutions at the annual UN session on Palestine.

But observers note that Israel itself places little importance in how Canada votes at the UN. The Jewish state regards the European Union as a much more serious player and indicator of world opinion.

More Likudniks moving to Sharon's new party

By DAN BARON
JTA

TEL AVIV — When Ariel Sharon quit the Likud party last month to form a new faction, his rivals predicted it would be a political retread of the centre-left Labor party.

But with Sharon's old colleagues bolting to follow him, the Kadima party could in fact turn out to be "Likud, the sequel."

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz on Sunday became the latest senior Likudnik to defect, deepening the disarray in an Israeli ruling party still trying to recover from Sharon's departure.

"The combination of the prime minister and myself, which has so resoundingly proven itself over the past few years, is the right and proper combination to lead Israel over the next few years," Mofaz told reporters, adding that Sharon had promised Mofaz would keep the defence portfolio should Kadima win the March 28 general election.

Victory seems almost assured, with surveys predicting that as many as 40 of the Knesset's 120 seats will go to Sharon, who is popular for the relative smoothness with which he engineered Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip this summer.

Sharon is also bolstered by his alliance with Shimon Peres, who quit Labor after being voted out as its leader, and by the support of other former Likud stalwarts such as Tzachi Hanegbi, Tzipi Livni and Ehud Olmert.

Kadima is followed in the polls by Labor under Peres' successor, Amir Peretz, who for years was the head of Israel's largest labor union. Likud is falling further and further behind.

Mofaz's walkout improves the prospects for Benjamin Netanyahu, the frontrunner in a Likud primary scheduled for next week. But in the general election, Netanyahu's more hardline stance on peace talks with the Palestinians looks doomed to fall on deaf ears, unless the Israeli security situation deteriorates drastically.

Shaul Mofaz

Tzachi Hanegbi

The possibility of that scenario appeared to be greater after the Hamas leader-in-exile, Khaled Meshaal, recently forecast redoubled terrorism in the new year, after a "truce" declared by Palestinian armed factions expires at the end of this month.

"I say it loudly: We will not enter a new truce, and our people are preparing for a new round of conflict," Meshaal told a Damascus rally last Friday.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who persuaded Hamas and other terrorist groups to scale back their attacks under the ceasefire he and Sharon declared in February, moved to maintain calm.

"We have agreed on one truce," Abbas said in a Gaza speech. "Therefore, we should continue with it until security prevails, in order that our citizens should not feel threatened by planes and tanks."

The declaration by Abbas fell far short of the counterterrorist crackdown required by the U.S.-led "road map" for peace

Israel, still smarting from the Islamic Jihad's suicide bombing in Netanya on Dec. 5, said that unless Abbas takes real action, it will consider converting the crossings on its boundary with Gaza to formal border terminals, which would slow the flow of Palestinian trade.

Moving to distinguish himself diplomatically, Peretz pledged that if elected prime minister, he would achieve peace.

"I will act to reach a permanent settlement between Israel and the Palestinians with the utmost speed," he told Yediot Achronot on Sunday. "By the end of our term, a permanent settlement must be behind us."

Canadian Jewish groups welcome move

Daniel Allen, executive vice-president of the American Friends of Magen David Adom, called the vote "proof positive that humanitarian concerns can come first, even in matters related to the Middle East."

Canadian Jewish groups also welcomed the development.

"Our community has long been troubled by the unjust lack of official status for Israel's national society, Magen David Adom… because neither of the existing emblems, a cross and a crescent, was suitable for Israel to adopt," said Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

He praised Switzerland for initiating the diplomatic conference that led to the change, and thanked the Canadian Red Cross (CRC) for backing MDA's cause.

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president, said Magen David Adom's acceptance by the Red Cross "represents the only just outcome" to a "protracted struggle," and said "it's an example of the kind of exceptional hurdles Israel must continually jump through in order to gain the sort of recognition in international fora that other countries simply take for granted."

B'nai Brith also praised both the CRC and the American Red Cross for their efforts on the issue.

A conference to admit MDA to the international movement is expected sometime in 2006. If accepted, MDA would be eligible to request funds from the international movement and would have access to training, information and forums from which it's now excluded.

"It's a great day for MDA, but it's also a great day for the movement," said Devorah Goldburg, a spokesperson for the American Red Cross, which since 2000 has withheld dues to the international body to protest Israel's exclusion.

Syrian opposition nearly scuttled last week's effort. Syria demanded that MDA enter into an agreement with the Syrian Red Crescent Society similar to one MDA signed recently with its Palestinian counterpart on how the agencies would operate in eastern Jerusalem.

Under the pact, in which MDA recognized the Palestinian Red Crescent as the national group in the territories, Palestinian ambulances are guaranteed speedier passage through the West Bank.

With support from some Islamic countries, Syria insisted that the Syrian Red Crescent be allowed to operate in the Golan Heights, which Israel conquered from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War. Participants said the demand was an obvious non-starter for Israel, which doesn't consider the Golan occupied territory.

As the conference dragged on without consensus, concern grew that the protocol, thought to be a sure thing going into the meeting, might fail. It was Swiss Foreign Minister Micheline Calmy-Rey who finally pushed the measure through.

As guardian of the Geneva Conventions, Switzerland had hoped the measure wouldn't have to come to a vote: The Red Cross traditionally makes decisions by consensus, giving the appearance of unanimity.

However, after three days of intensive negotiations – in which Switzerland and Pakistan often acted as intermediaries for the feuding nations – it finally became clear that there simply was not unanimity, though there was the two-thirds majority needed to pass the measure.

Calmy-Rey finally put the issue to a vote at 2 a.m. last Thursday. It passed 98-27, with 10 abstentions. All Muslim and Arab states voted against it, except for Jordan, which abstained.

The MDA will continue to use the red Star of David when operating in Israel. When working abroad, MDA personnel will display the star inside the red diamond.

A spokesperson for U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Annan was "delighted" by the decision and "hopes in particular that it will open the way for societies that are not yet formally part of the movement, such as the Israeli Magen David Adom, to be admitted as full members."

Adam Ereli, the U.S. State Department spokesperson, called the decision a "historic and significant" step toward "meeting the movement's goal of being truly universal."

Arab opposition has shut Israel out of the organization for decades. The Jewish state's candidacy was rejected during the 1949 Geneva Conventions, which insisted that new aid groups adopt the Red Cross emblem.

Among the major stumbling blocks has been Arab and Muslim states' refusal to accept the Star of David, arguing that the official symbols couldn't be changed – though the conventions indeed were changed to include the Islamic red crescent.

Backers of Israel had believed that the protocol would be approved easily this year. But trouble began on the first day of the conference when Syria – which demanded a deal like the Palestinians' – made clear it wasn't ready to move forward.

That set off three days of negotiations and sparked a series of proposed amendments from the Organization of the Islamic Conference that would, for example, have removed any mention of MDA from the measure.

Canadians aid lone IDF soldiers

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Olga German, 22, is completely alone. After making aliyah with her parents from Ukraine in 1990, she lost her mother to cancer in 1993 and then she lost her father to cancer in the midst of her Israel Defence Forces service, last July.

"When my dad died, I was left totally alone," German said.

A bright-eyed redhead who completed her military service this year and subsequently enrolled in the criminology program at Bar Ilan University, she said it was her dream to work for the FBI. To afford the three-year course, she originally intended to take it over six years and work at the same time.

"But even if they offered me a job, I would have to pass it up," she said with a smile, "because I will never leave Israel – no matter what."

Thanks to the newly established Heseg (achievement) Foundation for Lone Soldiers, German won't have to work at all to put herself through school. She is one of 111 recent graduates of the IDF without parents or extended family in Israel who recently received full tuition and living expense scholarships at the first annual Heseg Foundation Grants Awards Ceremony at Ganai Et-Arucha in Tel Aviv.

"This scholarship is saving my life," German said.

"All of the students who learn with me [at Bar Ilan] have parents who pay their rent, or their food, or their tuition, and I have nothing. This scholarship marks the difference between me being able to study, and not. I can't imagine where I would be without it."

The brainchild of Canadians Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman, the Heseg Foundation (Keren L'Chayalim Bodedim) represents their joint pledge to fund a minimum of 100 full scholarships each year for the next three years, to students enrolled in a minimum three-year program of study.

Under the auspices of the foundation, each scholarship recipient gets coverage for the full cost of their tuition for the entire duration of their degree, plus an average of 1,500 NIS per month to cover living expenses. At the program's peak – when more than 300 former soldiers are expected to be enrolled in studies – Schwartz estimates the foundation will distribute about $3 million (CDN) a year.

The only foundation of its kind dedicated exclusively to lone soldiers, the Heseg Foundation is the first to recognize the needs of the 5,000 to 6,000 volunteers in the IDF from abroad who enlist without the kind of support networks most domestic IDF soldiers have to make their stints of army duty easier.

The allotment of the grants is based on criteria – including need and military achievement – developed by Heseg's advisory board. The board includes Brig.-Gen. Eliezer Stern, head of manpower for the IDF and Maj.-Gen. Itzhak Eitan, head of Central Command. It is chaired by Itamar Rabinovich, president of the University of Tel Aviv. All were in attendance at the awards ceremony.

The ceremony also attracted Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Labor member of the Knesset Dalia Itzik, despite an Islamic Jihad terror attack that killed five and injured 66 in Netanya the same day.

"Your contribution through this foundation continues your long-standing tradition of support for the IDF and for Israeli society," Mofaz said. "Encouraging and supporting young individuals from abroad who have made the courageous decision to join their fellow brothers and help defend their nation and country by becoming lone soldiers directly supports the morale of the IDF and strengthens the Israeli society as a whole.

"Lone soldiers deserve every support. This foundation creates a new reality and provides new possibilities for these soldiers to build their future in Israel."

Peres echoed Mofaz's warm sentiments. Addressing the Canadian philanthropists, he said, "There is no other nation on earth that is more lonely than the Jewish people. We don't have a brother to our religion; we don't have a sister to our language; we don't have a partner to our history. We are really alone.

"You are helping today to help some of the best young Jewish people escape their loneliness so that they can help us to escape our loneliness."

The ceremony was a celebration that included music, food and drink. The building's halls were draped in festive Canadian flag/Mogen David decorations. Schwartz and Reisman arrived to the reception amid a sea of camera flashes and a flurry of excited scholarship recipients, who lined up and anxiously awaited their opportunity to thank the pair in person for their generous gift.

"For most of us, receiving this scholarship was the shock of our lives. It was the fulfilment of a dream," said 23-year-old recipient Carmella Fogel, who came to Israel from South Africa to serve as a combat soldier in the IDF.

Currently enrolled in an English-literature-and-language undergraduate degree program at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, Fogel worked throughout her first year of studies last year, in the Hebrew University Mechina program. "I held down six jobs," said Fogel, who listed cleaning houses, babysitting and working as a waitress and as a shopkeeper among her long list of former positions.

"Last year, I had to work and it was so evident in my marks that I wasn't concentrating solely on what I was supposed to be doing.

"Without this sort of help from people, I don't know how I would make it through the studies."

Scholarship recipient Ben Ninio, 23, from Australia, said that the scholarship "covers a nice chunk of my costs. It makes a very, very big difference." Ninio completed his service as a combat soldier a year ago and is studying business management at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

"In general, I think that lone soldiers are people with high motivation," he said. "The type of person who chooses to become a lone soldier may also be the type of person who will be more involved in his community after his service."

Reisman agreed with him. "This project is a real passion for us because it's an opportunity for us to invest in future leaders of Israel," she said.

Reisman is the founder of Indigo Books & Music Inc. and Schwartz is the chief executive officer of Onex Corporation, which he founded in 1983.

In addition to their numerous philanthropic efforts in Toronto, the couple is deeply involved with the Peres Peace Center (where they are building a library), the University of Tel Aviv (with which they are creating an exchange program with the University of Manitoba), and the Alyn Center for Disabled Children in Israel.

But the Heseg Foundation is the couples' latest project, and the one that has captured their hearts – and currently, most of their attention. "Lone soldiers as you know come here to Israel with no support, no family, and their ability to stay in Israel is very difficult when they get out of the IDF because they really have nobody to help them through," Schwartz said. "This program is designed to give them an opportunity to get well educated in Israel, stay here and have their families here, and become a permanent part of the country.

"We are a family. As Jews who live outside of Israel, I can tell you that that family extends to so many nations around the globe, and that every one of us in all of those faraway lands know that you're here – and you're here not just for yourself, or just for the State of Israel, you are here protecting the freedom of Jews around the world.

"As it turns out, today is a day of sorrow in Israel. What struck me most when I heard the news about what happened in Netanya earlier today was that those who fell are lost – not only to their families but to the State of Israel – and that you lone soldiers who are able to through these scholarships, commit yourselves to a life in Israel, take their place. As you take the place of those who have fallen, it makes me understand that Jews are not going to lose their freedom anywhere in the world and Jews are not going to be pushed out of the State of Israel," Schwartz said.

"Tonight you begin a new journey," Reisman added. "One whose destination is unknown, but whose future is truly limitless. In some way I worry a bit because we put a big responsibility on your shoulders. In you we invest our personal dreams for Israel and we want you to know that those are truly big dreams.

"But the very best part about the 21st century is that the coin of the realm is brainpower and heart power, and you – our inductees – are blessed with more than enough of both. It will be you – with your heart power and your brain- power – that will build the strength and the fabric of this country. But you should know that you are not alone.

"We are with you – now and forever," Reisman said.

Teen carries bombs

Israel Defence Forces troops arrested a 15-year-old boy attempting to smuggle two pipe bombs at a checkpoint near Nablus. He said he was trying to bring the bombs to Palestinians waiting on the other side of the checkpoint. The incident came a day after a Palestinian man fatally stabbed Nir Kahana, an IDF soldier, at a checkpoint near Kalandiya.

Fence behind schedule

Maj.-Gen. Moshe Kaplinski, the army's deputy chief of staff, told the Knesset that just 171 miles of the 474-mile route of the security fence are complete. Due to delays resulting from the rerouting of the fence in places where it was found to cause undue hardship to Palestinians, the new completion date will be the end of 2006, officials said.

Euthanasia law passed

Israel passed a law allowing the terminally ill to cut off life support. The bill was approved in the Knesset by a vote of 22-3, with one abstention. Under the new law, patients deemed to have six months or less to live can opt to have a special timer installed on their life-support systems, whose countdown system can be continually extended or not. Ethicists noted that since the mechanism gives the patient the option of not resuming life-support, it's different from active euthanasia and therefore consistent with Jewish morality. Health Minister Danny Naveh called the bill "one of the most complicated and important ever legislated by the Knesset."

Majority say corruption worse

Seventy-nine percent of Israelis believe corruption has worsened in the country in the past three years, and 65 per cent believe it "has worsened greatly," according to Transparency International's (TI) Global Corruption Barometer. TI, a non-profit organization that acts to curb global corruption in business and politics, surveyed 55,000 people in 69 countries, including 500 in Israel. Israelis felt the political parties were the most corrupt bodies of all followed by the Knesset and the religious establishment, including the rabbinate and the religious councils. The police, Tax Authority and the media were tied for fourth place in the perceived level of corruption. The IDF was ranked as the least corrupt body.

Trial drug may attack cause of Alzheimer's

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Alzheimer's disease is an irreversible, incurable brain disorder that affects 20 per cent of those over 85. That no doubt explains why more than 100 people braved a snowstorm last month to attend "Alzheimer's Disease: Understanding, Caring and Coping" a program at downtown's Windsor Arms Hotel.

The event was organized by the Alzheimer Society of Toronto and Weizmann Canada.

Contrary to popular belief, pure Alzheimer's disease is not the most common form of dementia in the elderly, said Morris Freedman, who is head of neurology, director of the behavioural neurology program and director of the brain health centre memory clinic at Baycrest,.

Alzheimer's disease is mainly a disorder of memory and cognition, said Freedman. Occasionally there is a genetic component, and research is being carried on in relation to that.

There are some drugs that help, especially Aricept, Exelon, Reminyl and Memantine, although, Freedman said, they should be seen as a crutch, helping people function for a time, while the disease is still progressing.

Other dementias – vascular dementia, mixed dementia, dementia with Lewy bodies and frontotemporal dementia – have not only different causes but different effects as well, he said.

Vascular dementia, he said, is caused by stroke, "even if the only evidence of stroke is what can be seen on a brain scan."

The 1997 Nun Study, a longitudinal study of aging and Alzheimer's disease of elderly members of the School Sisters of Notre Dame, showed that if someone has had a series of small strokes and suffers from Alzheimer's as well, then the result is much more severe than just one or the other.

In dementia with Lewy bodies, there are hallucinations, fluctuations in symptoms, and parkinsonism, Freedman said. Disorders of REM sleep (the deepest form of sleep) cause a person with that form of dementia to act out dreams physically, he added. In other words, if someone dreams of being attacked and of striking back in self-defence, he or she might well find themselves punching the person in bed next to them.

It is essential, he warned, to avoid the use of anti-psychotic drugs, such as Haldol or olanzapine, as they make the symptoms of Alzheimer's and dementia much worse.

Frontotemporal dementia may involve such results as a change in social conduct, poor hygiene and inappropriate jocularity.

For some reason, India has a very low prevalence of the disease, Freedman noted. While it is uncertain why this is so, it has been suggested that some ingredient in the ubiquitous curry may have something to do with it.

Joel Sussman, Morton and Gladys Pickman professor of structural biology at the Weizmann Institute of Science and director of the Israel Structural Proteomics Center, is researching the structure of proteins as a means of finding new treatments for such neurological disorders as Alzheimer's disease and autism.

Sussman said that 97.7 per cent of the DNA structure in human beings is exactly the same. It is the other .3 per cent that differentiates one from the other. That .3 per cent, he said, causes diseases to affect one person more than another, and causes a drug to work well on some people and not at all on others.

Everyone with HIV, for instance, doesn't get AIDS, and certain diseases, such as Tay-Sachs and Gaucher, affect mainly Ashkenazi Jews.

The idea, Sussman said, is to use this knowledge to design drugs that can target specific people, pathologies and characteristics.

A double blind study is currently being carried out by the Mayo Clinic, the Hong Kong University of Science and Technology and the Shanghai Institute of Materia Medica on Huperzine, a drug made from a moss in China that may break down the tangles formed in the proteins of the brain that are thought to cause Alzheimer's disease.

The program concluded with a presentation by Karen Henderson, a specialist in aging and long-term care. She read passages of a diary she kept during the 14 years she cared for her father who suffered from Alzheimer's.

Strong link between diet and prostate cancer: MD

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Canadian researcher says he is optimistic that prostate cancer will be regarded as a preventable disease by the end of the decade, because of mounting scientific evidence that diet plays a major role in its development.

Dr. Neil Fleshner of Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital says vitamin E, the trace mineral selenium and certain micronutrients found in soy and tomatoes are showing dramatic results in the laboratory of preventing prostate cancer, and slowing or even arresting its progression once diagnosed.

Fleshner was the guest speaker in Montreal at the recent inaugural Jewish General Hospital Prostate Cancer Lecture, whose aim is to raise awareness about the most common cancer of Canadian men.

Fleshner believes that prostate cancer is more closely linked to environmental factors than genetics. The association between diet and prostate cancer is stronger than that among other cancers, notably of the breast and colon, where there is some evidence of nutritional factors, he said.

Fleshner expects to publish results in a few months from a randomized trial he is heading that involves 310 men from across Canada with pre-cancerous lesions in their prostates, a condition associated with a high risk of getting cancer. For three years, half have been drinking a shake every day containing soy, vitamin E and micrograms of selenium, while the other half have been drinking a placebo.

A similar nutritional study of 28,000 North Americans with healthy prostates who are being followed over seven to 12 years is expected to report by about 2010, he said.

Fleshner foresees the day in the not-too-distant future when doctors will tailor a cocktail of micronutrients for their prostate cancer patients as a complement to traditional medicine.

Although vitamin E's popularity has suffered recently with reports that it has little positive effect on health and may even do harm in high doses, Fleshner said that, in vitro, up to 95 per cent of human prostate cancer cells are destroyed when treated with vitamin E. Selenium shows a similar effect.

Canadians' consumption of selenium is lower than in some other parts of the world because of the low concentration of the mineral in our soil, he said.

Lycopene, another micronutrient and potent antioxidant found in tomatoes, watermelons and guava has also been found to be beneficial. The environment, rather than genetics, has been suspected to be a significant factor in who gets prostate cancer. The rates of the disease vary widely around the world, with men in North America and northern Europe having the highest incidence and those in Japan and China among the lowest, he said. One in six North American men will get prostate cancer, an eight-fold higher rate than the Japanese.

Religious allegories in kids' film cause concern

The lion, the witch and Jesus?

Narnia* is a wonderful children's adventure, but critics say it promotes thinly veiled Christian theology.

By JOE ESKENAZI
JTA

A potential mega-blockbuster film, financed by a fervent Christian and bursting with Christian overtones, is being mass-marketed to – guess who? – Christians.

U.S. church groups are buying up whole theatre showings. Advance screenings are being held for pastors and ministers, who have literally given the film their blessing. Catholic publishing companies are putting out companion guides.

And the Jewish community is… well, no one knows quite what to think.

The film in question isn't Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ. It's The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe, the special-effects laden adaptation of British author C.S. Lewis' classic 1950 children's book.

The $250-million film, which opened Dec. 9, was produced by the evangelical billionaire Philip Anschutz. Walt Disney Co. also helped, especially on the distribution end. In fact, many of the same firms that so successfully recruited whole congregations to attend showings of The Passion have been contracted again for Lion.

The firing up of the machinery that pulled Christians into theatres and made The Passion a huge hit, as well as Lion's Christian overtones, have given some Jews reservations.

Rabbi Judah Dardik, spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Congregation in Oakland, Calif., read the entire seven-book Chronicles of Narnia series as a Jewish day-school student. It was only years later that he found out the books were steeped in Christian allegories.

He was "surprised and embarrassed. I hadn't realized. I felt duped," he said.

Rereading the series, he saw more and more allegories and could never appreciate the books as mere fiction again. Now he sees them as theology – beautifully written theology.

"Should Jewish children see this movie or read the books? I'm unsure," Rabbi Dardik said. "I read them… clearly it didn't affect my personal theology."

He added, "I haven't seen the movie, but I wouldn't be surprised if they fleshed out the Christianity a bit more to be satisfying to the Christian audience. That's the part that's most disconcerting to me."

Like Gibson, Anschutz is a figure who makes many wary. Walden Media in recent years began creating Christian-friendly films, short on sexual content or profanity – drug abuse and philandering were trimmed from last year's Ray Charles biopic Ray, for example.

Anschutz is also an outspoken evangelical Christian, and he was attracted to the Narnia tales for the same reason others in the business were repelled — its Christian messages.

But compared to the extremely negative reaction to The Passion from Jewish groups before, during and after its release, the marketing of Christian allegory as popular entertainment in Lion has hardly created a ripple.

The latent nature of Lion's Christian message, and the fact that one can be completely oblivious to it yet still enjoy the story, is allowing the film's producers to promote Lion on two levels: they use one method for avowedly Christian audiences, and one for everyone else that features special effects and battle scenes.

Disney is allocating about five per cent of its promotional budget to wooing Christian groups.

Peter Sealey, a marketing professor at the University of California Berkeley and a former president of marketing and distribution at Columbia Pictures, said it's "a very effective use of that money… [the Christian] audience does not have as many films as it wants."

Sealey, however, sees "duplicity" in the way Disney is shying away from Lewis' Christian message in its general publicity materials. In a 16-page "Narnia Educator Guide" on the film's website, religion and Christianity aren't mentioned even once, he said.

Disney "should let people know. The lion is resurrected… It's a great piece of entertainment and you can enjoy it if you're Christian or not. However, the underpinnings of the work reflect the New Testament."

The parallels between the Narnia tales and the New Testament are fairly obvious. For starters:

• Narnia is a magical kingdom created by the divine King Aslan that's in a state of perpetual winter due to a curse of the evil White Witch. Four children stumble into it via the enchanted, eponymous wardrobe and become Aslan's disciples. One child, Edmund, betrays his siblings and Aslan, Judas-style, to aid the White Witch. He is saved when Aslan allows himself to be sacrificed, not unlike Jesus.

• Aslan is resurrected and the White Witch is vanquished. The four children are crowned kings and queens of Narnia. Peter – not a coincidental choice of names – becomes High King.

• In the last of the Chronicles of Narnia, fittingly titled The Last Battle, an army described in a manner recalling the medieval Turks and aligned with a donkey in a lion costume (a false god?) invades Narnia. Those who believe in Aslan pass through a gate into another realm, where a beautiful kingdom is revealed. Aslan decrees that the four children, who died in the world of postwar Great Britain, can now live with him forever in paradise along with other believers.

JEWISH SPIRITUALITY FOCUS OF WOMEN'S TOUR TO ISRAEL

Helaine Finkelstein, who trained as a spiritual psychotherapist in Toronto before making aliyah in 2004, is the mashpiya or spiritual guide for a new tour of Israel designed for women with a curiosity about Jewish spirituality. Scheduled to depart in February, the tour offers a rare opportunity to learn about Jewish spirituality and Kabbalah with leading international scholars and teachers, and includes visits to key spiritual centres around Israel.

"People today are thirsty for spirituality and this is an opportunity to taste the beauty and richness that exists in our own tradition," Finkelstein said. "We will delve into layers of meaning that most people have not been exposed to and explore our individual connection to our roots through meditation, expressive writing and dance, Hebrew yoga and song."

Limited spaces are available for the first tour, Feb. 26 to March 9, 2006. Early-bird registration ends Dec. 22. Sara Trop, Payless Travel, 416-665-1010, ext. 145, or e-mail Finkelstein at innerjourney@012.net.il

More Canadians visit Israel: The latest stats from Israel's Ministry of Tourism show that almost 42,000 Canadians entered Israel in the first 10 months of 2005, a 14 per cent rise over 2004. "The numbers tell the story – Canadians continue to embrace Israel as a favourite holiday destination," said Dani Shahal, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada. Nearly 1.6 million international tourists visited Israel from January to October, a 27 per cent increase over the same period in 2004.

Jewish health care at YIVO: The topic of Jewish public health in pre-World War II Europe is the focus of "Fighting for a Healthy New Generation," a new exhibit at Manhattan's YIVO Institute for Jewish Research.

Through photographs, documents, posters, books and artifacts, the exhibition highlights the critical work of the Jewish relief organizations devoted to child care and protection, and medical and social aid in central, eastern and western Europe from 1912 to '42. Various Jewish health societies worked diligently to reduce the spread of infectious diseases, lower the high mortality rate, improve hygiene and raise the standard of living for Jewish populations.

The exhibition is on display at YIVO through February 2006. It later travels to the Museum of Contemporary Jewish History in Paris and the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw. YIVO, Center for Jewish History, 15 West 16th St., Manhattan. Free admission. 212-246-6080. www.yivo.org

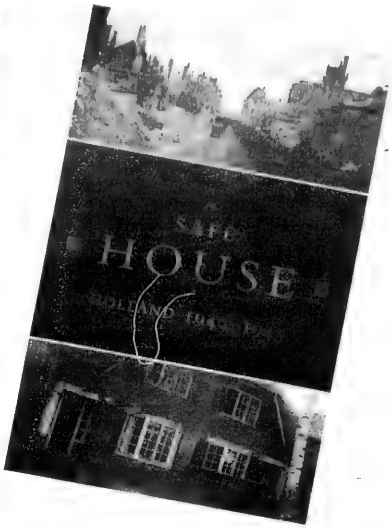
'A story of goodness well told'



By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In 1983, Mosaic Press published a shorter version of this book, titled Precautions Against Death. In it, a courageous Dutch woman, Lucie Wolsak, hides four Jews in her home during the Nazi occupation, with her daughter Maria and son Wil as allies.

For most of the book, with Wil studying out of town, Maria is her mother's main support. Maria Jacobs wrote this book to celebrate her mother's heroism – and when it went out of print, was persuaded to bring out an expanded version with photographs, called A Safe House (Seraphim Editions).

The new version fills in more details of the characters' lives up to the present, and makes the story more relevant to current events such as the war in Iraq.

Hiding several people in a home where, officially, only three live, is as complicated as it is dangerous. At one point, two German soldiers are billeted on them. Meanwhile, hard-scrabble drudgery is required just to keep from freezing and starving.

Jacobs tells the story in a mixture of poems and prose; the prose carries the story forward, while the poems highlight reflective moments. While most of the poems are in the author's voice, some let the other characters speak.

The hidden guests are never mere victims. Active members of the household, they make their own contributions to keeping life livable, humane and, by building secret rooms in the house, as safe as possible.

Some poets believe readers respect a poem more if they have to work to get the meaning. One way to make them work is to write poems that need decoding; another is to make the themes challenging in their own right. Jacobs has chosen the second way.

Her style is plain-spoken, but with an eye for the telling detail: how the legs of a sawhorse set up to cut firewood wear holes in a carpet; how the cat drags home a grimy lump that, when cleaned, turns out to be a delicious cheese. This book is rich in moments like these.

Because of such moments, this is not a book to read in a hurry. Indeed, no good book of poems is, as poems need time to savour.

Reading more slowly should also make it easier to imagine the six years during which the main body of the story unfolds. One of Jacobs' major points is that "doing the right thing" is seldom a momentary act. Real heroism takes staying power and attention to detail.

The Nazi evil notwithstanding, this is an enjoyable book. It is a good story: a story of goodness, well told.

TEATRON THEATRE COMPANY PRESENTS WARTIME PLAY HOME OF THE BRAVE

The Teatron Theatre Company opens its third season with Home of the Brave by Arthur Laurents, an award-winning drama dealing with the challenges of Jewish servicemen in the army during World War II. Set in a military hospital in the South Pacific in 1944, the play focuses on a group of soldiers, including Jewish Private Peter (Coney) Coen, as they deal with the pressure of battle and feelings of camaraderie, prejudice, love and disappointment.

Directed by Ari Weisberg and featuring Tony Bossio, Lucas James, David McCormick, Dennis Mockler, Jonathan Siegel and Benjamin Taylor.

Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. $40-$15. Previews Tuesday, Jan. 10, runs Jan. 11 to 15, 8 p.m. Matinées Jan. 11 & 15, 2 p.m.

On Thursday, Jan. 12, Teatron offers an opportunity to discuss the play's thought-provoking ideas with the cast and the director, immediately after the show. For tickets, 416-855-6651. [See picture on next page.]

Walking the Bible: Tales and locales of the Bible are coming to television in January as the American PBS network airs the three-hour miniseries Walking the Bible, based on a bestselling book by Bruce Feiler. Filmed in five countries, the series includes footage from Mount Ararat, where Noah's Ark supposedly came to rest, to the Dead Sea region, the lowest spot on earth.

Viewers will journey along with Feiler as he travels – by boat, jeep, camel and foot – the paths of Moses, Isaac, Jacob and the Israelites. Airs Jan. 4, 11 & 18, 8 p.m.

Names in the News

• Filmmaker Steven Spielberg recently turned over his Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation to the University of Southern California. Since its founding in 1994, the foundation has grown into the world's largest digital library, with 52,000 videotaped testimonies of Holocaust survivors and witnesses from 56 countries in 32 languages. The famed director of Schindler's List had contributed $65 million to the cost of the $150-million (all figures US) project.

• The Disney Corporation has paid $2.6 million to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for the right to market a new range of educational toys under the name "Baby Einstein." Albert Einstein, the famed physicist, left his intellectual property and writings to the university when he died 50 years ago. The university earns about $1 million per year by licensing out the right to use the Einstein image.

500 things you should know about Chanukah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Chanukah, the festival of lights, is almost upon us. So now is a prime time to immerse yourself in its rich history and customs.

Rabbi Jeffrey M. Cohen's primer, 500 Questions and Answers on Chanukah, published by Vallentine-Mitchell, is the perfect place to start.

It is, by far, one of the best single-volume accounts of this special holiday. Sit down and read it, chapter by chapter, or all in one go.

It consists of nine chapters, beginning with the historical and religious background and then seguing to the sources, laws and rituals of Chanukah.

Rabbi Cohen subsequently deals with Chanukah themes and philosophical insights, and the lighting of the chanukiah. This is followed by chapters on Chanukah in the synagogue and home and Chanukah customs around the world.

In conclusion, he presents a Chanukah quiz for the younger generation.

You might wonder why we need another book on Chanukah. Rabbi Cohen lists two compelling reasons.

"First, because of the fascinating period of Jewish history that this festival spans," he writes.

"My second purpose... is to fill a vacuum. I am not aware of any other book in the English language that has treated this festival in such a detailed and comprehensive manner."

The rabbi's format, short questions followed by longer answers, is sound and truly enlightening.

He poses many questions, such as: What was Hellenism? How did the relationship between Judea and the Greek occupiers develop? Why did it go sour? What finally prompted the Jewish military revolt?

What is the origin of the name Maccabee? How many battles did the Maccabees have to fight before they regained the Temple and Jewish independence? What is the traditional view regarding the miracle of the Chanukah oil? Are there any prohibitions regarding the observance of Chanukah?

And so on and so on.

500 Questions and Answers on Chanukah is encyclopedic in breadth, and can be read by adults and children alike.

Rogers Cable to carry The Israeli Network

Most Rogers Digital Cable customers in Ontario will be able to receive The Israeli Network, the Ethnic Channels Group Limited (ECGL) has announced.

The Israeli Network is available to Rogers Digital Cable customers in Ontario on Channel 635. Rogers is the first operator in Canada to launch the network.

A free preview of the channel will be available to all Rogers Digital Cable customers in Ontario until Jan. 4, 2006. Then Rogers Digital Cable customers can purchase The Israeli Network, for $14.95 a month. Customers must have a digital set-up box, which they can rent for as low as $3.99 a month, plus an additional $1.99 a month digital services fee, or purchase a box, starting at $99.

The Israeli Network is the only 24-hour-a-day Hebrew-language TV channel featuring the best of Israeli TV for viewers in Canada. The network highlights selected shows from Israel's leading channels and showcases educational and cultural programs about Israel and the Israeli culture.

"We're thrilled to launch The Israeli Network on Rogers Digital Cable," says Slava Levin, ECGL's co-founder, chief executive officer, and president. "Our years of experience in the multicultural television and broadcast industry will allow us to make available to Rogers Cable viewer one of the best multicultural services on the dial."

Mayer's image of America 'innocent and wholesome'

Lion of Hollywood: The Life and Legend of Louis B. Mayer* by Scott Eyman, Simon and Schuster.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Louis B. Mayer, the Hollywood titan who built and ran Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer as his personal fiefdom for three decades, was "probably the greatest single force in the development of the motion-picture industry to the heights of prosperity and influence it finally attained," according to Variety, the entertainment industry Bible.

To those who knew him, Mayer seemed as powerful, fearsome and perhaps at times even as carnivorous as the famous roaring lion that opened the countless films that his vast studio produced: the list includes The Wizard of Oz, Meet Me in St. Louis, Ninotchka, The Thin Man and An American in Paris. The studio was especially famed for its musicals featuring stars such as Fred Astaire, Ginger Rogers, Gene Kelly, Judy Garland and Debbie Reynolds.

A Russian-born Jew who spent his early years in Saint John, N.B., where his family had a scrap metal business, Louis B. Mayer (1885-1957) built an early chain of movie houses in the eastern United States and made his first fortune by purchasing the rights to D.W. Griffith's colossal commercial success, Birth of a Nation, for the New England states. Mayer is credited with helping to establish a cinematic image of Middle America as innocent and wholesome as, say, Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney as they appeared in MGM's famous series of Hardy family films. As Scott Eyman suggests in his engaging new biography Lion of Hollywood: The Life and Legend of Louis B. Mayer, Mayer simply universalized the traditional family values that he absorbed from his father and mother.

Far from harbouring any lofty or high-falutin' notions of art, the film industry pioneer is depicted as an uncultured sentimentalist who preferred bestsellers to classics. He saw motion pictures as "beautiful photographs that move" and felt that things that were too dark, unpleasant or realistic, or that otherwise made audiences squirm, had no place on the screen. Movies, he felt, should offer a sanitized version of life.

As one of America's most influential citizens, Mayer walked in privileged circles: he made and broke careers, hobnobbed with presidents and industrial magnates, and was variously loved, respected, feared or despised by everyone who was anyone in Hollywood. As Eyman meticulously chronicles through a rich parade of anecdotes, Mayer's personal sense of power knew no bounds. For instance, soon after Edward VIII abdicated the British throne in 1936, the studio magnate wanted to hire him to head MGM's European operations. "How much do you think he gets?" he asked his advisers, who delicately dissuaded him from cabling a lucrative offer to the ex-monarch.

Mayer built an extraordinary motion-picture factory from the ground up, one that seemed to churn out product as reliably as an automobile assembly line. He devised a writer mentoring program through which groups of up to a dozen veteran and novice writers shared offices, ate together, looked at movies together and rehashed old scripts in search of new workable ideas. At one time MGM employed 15 readers in New York and 10 in California who read 20,000 novels, stories and original scripts a year.

Eyman gives us the inside track on the making of many films, both famous and forgotten, and recounts episodes involving many celebrated producers and directors from Dore Schary to Nicholas Schenck, and especially Mayer's uniquely talented assistant, Irving Thalberg. However, his primary concern is Mayer himself, and discussion of MGM's huge vault of films is by necessity abbreviated. Thus, we are given only the tantalizing bare facts regarding director Victor Fleming's annus mirabilis of 1939, the year he directed most of two back-to-back American cinematic classics, Gone With the Wind and The Wizard of Oz: "Mayer yanked Victor Fleming off The Wizard of Oz, threw him onto the set of Tara, and had King Vidor finish Oz. Everybody at the dance had changed partners, and Mayer finally had what he wanted." Like a good entertainer, Eyman leaves us wanting more.

Knowing the machinery of Hollywood from the inside out, Mayer believed that it was his own correct choices – not someone's innate talent or screen appeal – that made actors like Spencer Tracy or Clark Gable great. He contended that he rescued Tracy from being just a reasonably good character actor playing unmemorable villains because he saw something wonderful about his face.

Mayer usually had terrific instincts about how to present his stars to the public, and knew, for example, not to attempt to turn a romantic heart-throb like Gable into an on-screen intellectual.

Because he had invested so much in his stars, he felt entitled to dictate their personal lives. Like other MGM actresses, June Allyson dropped a boyfriend on Mayer's insistence, but when she began dating Dick Powell and was again ordered to stop, she refused; her "tactical master stroke" was to ask him to give her away at the wedding.

A dreaded bully who didn't pull his punches, Mayer could reduce the meek to tears through ruthless negotiation tactics involving shouts, insults, tirades and worse. "If the tirade didn't achieve the desired results, Mayer would escalate into a full-scale tantrum, hurling himself to the floor, and rolling around on the rug," Eyman relates.

His weak spot was his sentimentality. Once, when actress Ann Rutherford told him she needed to buy a house for her mother and grandmother, tears welled up in his eyes and he readily acceded to her requested raise.

Still, his familial relations seemed to reflect little of the warmth and purity that he and his studio generally espoused. He neglected and then divorced his first wife, Margaret, and had poor relations with their two daughters. Daughter Irene ignored his orders and happily married the talented movie producer, David O. Selznick. On the plus side of the ledger, he hired so many relatives – his own and his wife's – that insiders joked that the true meaning of MGM was "Mayer's ganze mishpocheh."

Ultimately, due to his short-sighted habit of taking compensation in the form of cash instead of stock, Mayer lost control of the studio after a prolonged and debilitating power struggle.

As Eyman astutely observes, the legendary lion of MGM was motivated throughout his life by a desire to belong and be accepted as an American. For that reason, he used his Yiddish only with a few trusted associates and, out of fear of sparking an anti-Semitic backlash, rarely allowed references to the Jewish people in the studio's films. Yet it was his fundamentally Jewish concept of "home," universalized for mass consumption, that became his hallmark, Eyman concludes. "It's no accident that the primary motivation in so many of the great MGM films, from The Wizard of Oz to Meet Me in St. Louis, from The Human Comedy to The Yearling, is home – its creation, its preservation, or returning to it," he writes.

Lion of Hollywood: The Life and Legend of Louis B. Mayer is a richly detailed and eminently readable biography that will appeal to all fans of the popular American cinema.

Twelve-year-old tumbling champ faces career decisions ahead

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

The next six months will go a long way in telling exactly where Loni Maxwell's tumbling career is headed. Her coach, Chris Hanley, says it will be up to the reigning 12-year-old Canadian champion to decide how far to push her limits.

Maxwell was recently back in action in Burlington at the season's first provincial qualifier for next April's Ontario championships. It was her first competition on the tumbling strip since she registered a surprising ninth place finish at the World Age Group Championships in Eindhoven, Netherlands, in late September. Though she has lots of talent, it was surprising because she wasn't as prepared as she could have been when she entered the event.

Maxwell took a number of weeks off last summer to attend Camp Kadima in Nova Scotia, and Hanley said it took quite a bit of time just to get back to the level she was at before going away.

"She just started to look OK two weeks before worlds," said Hanley. "Going over there, we really didn't have huge expectations. Even in the trainings over there, she was struggling. When it came time to compete, she performed really well and came through under pressure. She's a very good competitor and usually rises to the competition."

Maxwell finished as the best of four Canadians in the field of 34 in what was her first international competition.

Hanley helped Maxwell get ready for the event by showing her video footage of athletes who competed in previous worlds. The idea was to give her an appreciation of the kind of tumblers she'd be competing against.

"I thought I was going to do kind of bad because I thought everyone was going to do skills so much harder than mine," said Maxwell, who admitted to being very nervous before the competition. "[Fortunately], only a couple did skills that I was really worried about."

The Richmond Hill resident has been tumbling at Pulsar's Gymnastics in Newmarket since she took up the sport just over two years ago. Following a second-place showing at the Canada Cup competition in Ottawa last May, Maxwell became Canadian champion later the same month in Vancouver.

A Grade 7 student in the arts program at Baythorn Public School in Thornhill, Maxwell has taken to the sport naturally. It tends to be dominated by athletes who have retired from gymnastics – mainly because it is less time-consuming – and Maxwell is an ex-artistic gymnast.

She trains four days a week, with each session lasting at least two hours. About six hours is spent on the tumbling strip itself. There are also about two to three hours of physical conditioning and an hour is set aside for trampoline work.

"The key to her success is that, for a child that age, she has the drive and the ability to focus on what she's doing," said her mother, Vivian. "She manages to do very well under pressure."

In addition to participating in hip-hop, jazz, and acrobatics classes at Vibe Dance and Fitness in Thornhill, Maxwell enjoys snowboarding and swimming. She has also started taking private Hebrew lessons to prepare for her bat mitzvah next September.

Hanley said if Maxwell is to develop to her full potential she'll have to reconsider some of her extracurricular activities.

"A lot of motivation is required from me for her training," he said. "If she's going to continue down the path, she needs to become more independent and basically decide where she wants to take this sport.

"It's getting to the point now where she's got to make the decision to take that next step forward. The mental side of things has got to get a little bit stronger. Her overall dedication has to improve a little bit. She's young and getting at that pivotal stage where she has to make the decision of what she's going to do."

Champion admits he was nervous

Three of the seven players on the 2005 Canadian team were Jewish: Logan, Wapnick and Toronto's Zev Kaufman. Out of 105 players from 41 countries (including two from Israel) who competed in London, about 10 per cent were Jewish.

So what gives? Logan believes that "whatever concentrates Jews in mathematics, computer programming, law and other intellectual professions presumably has the same effect for Scrabble."

He said in his case, there must be a correlation between his being a mathematician and his success in Scrabble, but he's hard-pressed to say what it is.

In addition, he said, friends from common ethnic backgrounds tend to learn about the competitive Scrabble scene together. But he also noted that while some of the best Jewish Scrabble players hail from Canada, the United States and Australia, this has not been the case in the United Kingdom or New Zealand.

Certainly, for Logan himself, the win capped a dramatic tournament that, at certain points, could have gone another way. Logan won 20 out of 24 games in the first round, and then the next three in a row (he had to win three out of five) in the final round. Logan said he actually clinched a ticket to the finals in his 22nd game – against Australia's Naween Fernando.

"I was behind for most of it, but caught up at the end when my opponent blocked the wrong spot and I played a seven letter word on my last turn."

That word was "fifteen." Logan had those two magical blank tiles and won 432-386.

Logan admits he was was nervous before the first game of the finals, and not without reason, as things turned out. Logan had to play catch-up for most of the game. He was down by more than 80 points at one point, and Nemitrmansuk was ahead 432 to 386 when Logan went out with the word "twistier" in the last move. Final score in the first finals game: 524 for Logan, 409 for Nemitrmansuk.

"After the first game I was never seriously threatened in the finals," Logan said.

Logan prepared for the championship, in part, by playing as often as possible. For two years, he taught at a university in Liverpool and "played with a world dictionary all the time."

He spent his word-study time boning up on British words. "One of the problems with playing in the world championship is that a lot of words are acceptable there that aren't good in North America.

"My main method of preparation is to use a computer to practise finding the words available in a set of letters, but playing and analyzing my games is also important."

You also have to be lucky, Logan said, but that's less important in a tournament because of the number of games played. Luckily for Logan, he got both blank tiles – which makes you a favourite to win – in 10 of his games, and no blank tiles in only one or two of them. "It really helps," he said.

Kaufman, who was Logan's roommate during the championship and finished 58th, was delighted by his friend's victory.

"I'm very happy," he said, "Adam has been in every top 10, and in the past, just missed. He was overdue in winning it."

German soccer team repents

JTA

DRESDEN — A German soccer team apologized on behalf of fans who unfurled an anti-Semitic banner at a game Dec. 5.

The banner featured the word "Juden," or Jews, with the letter D emphasized as a slur against the Dynamo Dresden team. The image was broadcast live on German television. Germany's soccer scene is under increasing scrutiny as the country prepares to host the World Cup next summer.

In an open letter to the Dresden team, Michael Voigt and Sven Fischer, spokesmen for the FC Energie Cottbus team, wrote, "This 'JUDEN'-banner, and the point of view connected with it, represents neither the mindset nor the behavior of the entire Cottbus fan scene, and we strongly condemn it. Such incidents don't belong in a soccer stadium."

A German group, the Foundation for Active Soccer Fans, noted in a press release last week that it's routine for German soccer fans and players to call the opposition Jews, but this time it happened to occur during a live broadcast.

Playing the hate game

ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa

Advances in the production and distribution of independent music, games and literature have made reaching impressionable youths around the world easier than ever before for white supremacist organizations.

Over the years, international watchdog groups that focus on inflammatory racism and extremism coming from white supremacist groups such as the National Alliance (NA) and the World Church of the Creator (WCOTC) have made it very difficult for these groups to gather without attracting attention to themselves. As a result, racist organizations have been forced to turn to other methods of delivering their propaganda in their efforts to recruit new members.

Throughout the world, disaffected white teens are becoming inundated with venomous messages of hate being spewed forth in the form of white power rock, violently racist video games and explicit comic books and graphic novels that portray neo-Nazi protagonists ridding the world of the so-called "non-white threat."

Underground white power rock groups are among the most influential weapons used by racist organizations. Leading the efforts is Resistance Records, an online distributor of neo-Nazi music, computer games and literature owned by the National Alliance (NA), one of the largest white supremacist organization in the United States.

Resistance Records was founded in 1993 in Windsor Ont., by Canadian musician George Burdi, leader of the most influential white power rock group of the time, RaHoWa – an acronym for Racial Holy War. Following an arrest in 1997, Burdi's passion for his cause soured (he has since left the movement, married an East Indian Hindu woman and formed a band that includes a black bassist and a Jewish guitarist) and the label was taken over by the NA.

Following the label's success in reaching many teens throughout the 1990s, Resistance Records released its most unsettling product to date in 2002. Its computer game Ethnic Cleansing allows gamers to choose between playing as a white-robed Ku Klux Klansman or a skinhead in this disturbing interpretation of the Doom franchise and other popular first-person shoot-em-up action games.

The premise involves the game's hero fighting in decrepit American streets and neighbourhoods in an effort to rid the world of non-whites. Blacks and Latinos are summarily eradicated, or "cleansed," uttering ape noises and stereotypical phrases upon their deaths, as the protagonist makes his way to a lair inhabited by evil Jewish masters awaiting execution. The game ends when Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, brandishing a rocket launcher and hurling insults, is defeated.

While not the first game of its kind, Ethnic Cleansing is by far the most advanced one released so far in terms of graphics, effects, storyline and level of background and auditory detail.

With the ability of organizations such as the NA to spread their message so easily throughout the world, putting a stop to this kind of destructive behaviour may prove to be impossible. Rallies and concerts, which at one time were the primary ways that neo-Nazi groups were able to distribute their message, are no longer necessary and have in fact become too risky with organizations such as the Anti-Defamation League and Anti-Racist Action, among a host of others, keeping a vigilant eye on such activity.

As technology continues to advance, so too will the quality and number of products that neo-Nazi groups will be able to use as weapons in what they say is a propaganda war between whites and non-whites. With suggestible teens being introduced to products that present hatred as fun and trendy, a rise in membership among global hate groups seems to be a certainty.

Low-Fat Sweet Potato Latkes

1 3/4 lbs. sweet potatoes peeled
1 onion
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. white pepper
5 egg whites, lightly beaten
1/3 cup flour
canola oil

Grate potatoes and onion in processor; drain well in colander or in a cheesecloth. Place in large mixing bowl. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Mix in eggs. Add flour and mix well.

In large non-stick skillet, heat 2 tblsp. oil. Spoon out batter, being careful not to crowd; press into 3" pancakes. Cook 1 1/2 min. per side. Add as little oil to pan as needed to keep pancakes from sticking. Keep finished pancakes warm in oven until all pancakes are fried; bake pancakes at 450°F for 10 min. until golden brown. Turn over and bake additional 5 mins. Serve hot.

Makes approx. 4 servings.

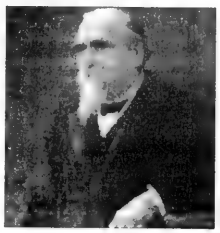
"Jews in history"

By JOE KING



Luigi Luzzatti, prime minister of Italy in 1910-11

Luigi Luzzatti (1841-1927) parlayed his success in organizing a mutual aid society for gondoliers in Venice into ultimately becoming prime minister of Italy.

Luzzatti was born into a prominent Venetian Jewish family. After his elementary studies, he took a law degree and then studied to become a professor of economics and constitutional law. He was deeply concerned about social injustice all his life.

After Luzzatti organized a mutual aid society for Venetian gondoliers, he was called a revolutionary and expelled from the city. However, instead of being discouraged, he journeyed from city to city in Italy, organizing mutual aid societies.

These organizations, he declared, would "assure you a subsidy in case of illness, a pension fund [that] provides for your old age. Workmen's associations enable you to acquire your own homes, cooperative warehouses provide food and other necessities at a low price."

Luzzatti entered the Italian parliament shortly after he turned 30. He was in cabinet and played other leading roles during the turbulent years that led to the seizure of power by Benito Mussolini and the fascists in 1922.

In 1910, he was named prime minister of Italy. He held that office for only a short time, but managed to push through legislation banning pornography, white slavery and cruelty to animals. Even out of office, he pressed for liberal legislation including compulsory accident insurance.

In 1925, he spoke out for a Jewish state, declaring: "The bold experience of colonization undertaken by the Jews in Palestine has a value transcending that of the problems of race and Zionism. It proves that the Jews can, after 20 centuries, be again unsurpassable cultivators, and it proves, too, that the Syrian land, for thousands of years a squalid, desolate, rocky desert, can become once more a smiling desert."

Excerpted from The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World.

Roots of Empathy: a shared humanity

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Fifteen million human beings were slaughtered in World War I. Fifty-five million people were killed in World War II. Twenty million North American natives were wiped out when the "white man" arrived. Stalinism brought death to 20 million people.

The total of these destructive times alone exceed 100 million. Google "war casualties history" and you will be astonished at the lengthy list of battles in the last century alone, and the millions more butchered in places such as Rwanda and Sudan.

The reality of so much of our history is blood red. We need to figure out how to halt this horror and pursue a road of compassion, love and empathy. We must find out how we can create a peaceful world. The following might help.

I am currently reading a book called Roots of Empathy (Thomas Allen), by Mary Gordon. The title of the book is also the name of a schoolroom program created by Gordon that fosters empathy within children. Gordon's 20 years of work led her to the discovery that a "solution to bullying and other anti-social behaviour lies within each child's natural sense of caring and compassion."

Over two decades, Gordon has trained parents as volunteers and worked with school administrators and teachers. As part of the program, she invites parents to bring their babies into a classroom to interact with the students. According to Gordon's data, it has been proven that this "symbiotic loving environment" reduces aggression and increases tolerance and emotional understanding in children.

In this 250-page book, the reader learns about Gordon's work with various children. One of her most touching anecdotes is of Grade 8 studentDarren, who saw his mother murdered when he was four years old. In the classroom, Darren volunteered to hold a six-month-old baby in his arms. The mother was a tad nervous seeing Darren's shaved head, and a tattoo on the back of it. But she acquiesced.

Gordon writes, "The little baby snuggled right in, and Darren took him into a quiet corner and rocked back and forth with the baby in his arms for several minutes." She writes that afterward, Gordon approached the Roots of Empathy instructor and shyly asked, "If nobody has ever loved you, do you think you could still be a good father?"

Gordon – a recipient of the Distinguished Canadian Educator Award – maintains that through this interaction hope had risen up in Darren's heart and "through these moments of contact with the critical affection of the baby, an adolescent boy has caught an image of himself as a parent that runs counter to his loveless childhood."

Roots of Empathy is rife with stories of schoolyard bullies converting to supportive classmates. As well, the book notes there was a decrease in teenage pregnancies among the more than 68,000 students the program has reached.

It is a wonderfully fluid book, with a hopeful model that constitutes a new model for child rearing, Gordon contends, and "an approach that could very well change our world."

It is time we developed a shared and multi-dimensional strategy to end war, hatred and violence. It has to include the wealthy entrepreneur, a home parent, a Lebanese shepherd – all kinds of persons – and draw upon wisdom, knowledge and compassion found in the essence of Torah, the teachings of all great religions, and in classic literature and poetry.

A true desire and consciousness must exist. Then we must find "the way." Roots of Empathy might be a piece of that puzzle.

"Little did we guess that what has been called the century of the common man would witness as its outstanding feature more common men killing each other with greater facilities than any other five centuries together in the history of the world." – Winston Churchill

No lasting stroke damage to Sharon

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Physicians at Hadassah University Hospital, Ein Karem, in Jerusalem said Monday they hoped to release Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Tuesday, after a new series of tests, including a CAT scan and an MRI, to determine the effects of the stroke he had on Sunday evening.

The stroke, termed a mild cerebral vascular event, "will not leave behind any damage or any traces," said Dr. Tamir Ben-Hur, chief of the hospital's neurology department.

"There's an excellent chance it won't repeat itself," Ben-Hur said. "After a rest, he can return to full functioning.

"I want him to rest in the coming days, but he is used to hard work, so you can't compare him to anyone else. I think after he rests he will be able to return to normal activity."

A senior aide to Sharon said it would be several days before he returns to his gruelling work schedule.

"It might be a few days before he returns to his full work level… his 20-hour day," Ilan Cohen said. "They say, in the next few days, he needs to get more rest and return to full capacity gradually."

Ben-Hur said the clot had been caused by a minor malfunction in the heart, which he said is not uncommon in otherwise healthy people. Sharon's condition will be closely monitored after his release from hospital, his doctors said.

The prime minister was rushed to the medical centre's trauma unit Sunday after having the stroke and briefly losing consciousness.

Doctors said Monday that Sharon had been conscious throughout the hospital stay. "There was no paralysis, and in medical terms, he wasn't confused," Ben-Hur told a news conference. "He had some difficulty in his speech, which was caused by a small blood clot."

Full blood supply to the brain was restored, Ben-Hur said.

Israel ponders Iranian nuclear threat

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Iran may be just months away from being able to produce a nuclear bomb, and a fierce debate is raging in Israel over how to react.

The critical date could come in March, when a series of developments will converge:

• It will be too late to stop Iran from making a bomb, according to Israel's chief of military intelligence, Maj. Gen. Aharon Farkash-Ze'evi.

• The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is due to issue a report that month on Iran's nuclear drive that could lead to sanctions against Tehran or highlight the international community's inability to act in concert on the issue.

• Israeli elections are scheduled for March 28, with the Iranian nuclear threat already shaping up to be a hot campaign issue.

Please see related stories on pages 3, 40

• The London Sunday Times claims Israel has ordered elite forces to be ready by late March for a possible strike against Iranian nuclear facilities.

Both Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office and Israeli defence officials dismissed the Sunday Times story as a "baseless fabrication."

At the same time, Sharon says Israel will not be able to tolerate a nuclear Iran and that the Jewish state has the capability to act to prevent it.

Hate Hearing Ends

TORONTO — A human rights tribunal hearing against a London, Ont., white supremacist who posted anti-Jewish and anti-black messages on the Internet heard closing arguments last week. Tomasz Winnicki's lawyer, Chi-Kun Shi, argued Canadians can handle the messages he posted and said they should be allowed in a society that values free expression. Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman launched the complaint against Winnicki in September 2003, alleging he violated the Canadian Human Rights Act by posting the messages because they would likely expose Jews and blacks to hatred or contempt. A ruling in the case could take several months, the London Free Press reported.

WORLD

Mayor Partly Cleared

LONDON — London's mayor was partially cleared last week of charges stemming from his comparison of a Jewish journalist to a concentration camp guard earlier this year. The panel hearing Ken Livingstone's case cleared him of a misconduct charge, ruling he did not make the comments in an official capacity because he said them after leaving a reception. But Livingstone, who refused last week to apologize for the remarks, still faces a second misconduct charge of harming his post as mayor. If found guilty, he could be removed from office.

Kids Picket Wal-Mart

BOSTON — Children from a Jewish Sunday school in Boston joined their parents and siblings at a Dec. 11 rally outside a local Wal-Mart to protest the company's alleged use of sweatshop labour. The fifth-graders from the Boston Workmen's Circle school were among 150 people who took part in the protest as part of a school lesson on labour history. A company spokesperson told the Boston Globe that it's not Wal-Mart's policy to sell products made in sweatshops.

'Jew Jersey' Wins

NEW YORK — A media watchdog website last week awarded the Denver Daily News its "correction of the year" for an apology for a typo that referred to New Jersey as "Jew Jersey." Calling the paper's apology "entirely inadequate," the Regret the Error website asked: "The News offends an entire state and a major religion and all it can muster is 39 words?" The July 27 correction read as follows: "The Denver Daily News would like to offer a sincere apology for a typo in Wednesday's Town Talk regarding New Jersey's proposal to ban smoking in automobiles. It was not the author's intention to call New Jersey 'Jew Jersey.'"

Circumcision Warning

NEW YORK — The New York City Health Department last week issued a warning against a certain type of circumcision. It concerns metzitzah b'peh, a method used only in some haredi communities that involves the mohel placing his mouth directly on the wound. The warning comes after a New York rabbi's use of metzitzah b'peh in 2004 allegedly led to the death of a baby who contracted herpes.

Brunner in Brazil?

SAO PAULO — Brazilian officials were investigating last week whether a Nazi war criminal is hiding in their country. During World War II, Alois Brunner was an assistant to Nazi Adolf Eichmann, the organizer of the "Final Solution" to kill Europe's Jews. The Austrian-born Brunner, who would be 95 if he's still alive, is believed to have spent the past 40 years in Syria under the name Dr. Georg Fischer before moving to South America.

Judge Threatens Portus Co-founder With Jail

JERUSALEM — A Tel Aviv judge last week threatened the Israeli co-founder of Portus Alternative Asset Management with jail time if he didn't turn in more than 100 diamonds he allegedly bought using cash from the failed hedge fund.

Portus' receiver, KPMG, says Boaz Manor, who fled to Israel last March after the Toronto-based firm collapsed, used $8.8 million of Portus money to buy the stones, and it wants Manor to turn them over, the Globe and Mail reported.

Manor filed an affidavit saying he doesn't have them. The matter was to be heard in court on Sunday.

KPMG has gone to court in Canada and Israel to force Manor to co-operate in accounting for $800 million in missing investor money. He has denied wrongdoing and says he's mentally ill and can't answer KPMG's questions.

The OSC has laid three charges each against Manor and Portus co-founder Michael Mendelson, saying they destroyed documents and improperly sold Portus products to investors. Mendelson is reportedly negotiating a deal with the OSC. The RCMP is also investigating the Portus case.

Earlier this month, two KPMG vice-presidents travelled to Israel to conduct a court-ordered questioning of Manor, but he appealed the order and is now not expected to speak to KPMG until the new year, the Globe reported.

A Chanukah Reminder from

Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

Political leaders condemn Iranian president

Denies Holocaust took place; suggests Israel be moved to another country

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Leaders of all three national parties have condemned the most recent anti-Semitic remarks by the president of Iran, who last week denied the Holocaust and suggested Israel be moved to Europe, the United States, or perhaps even Canada.

Prime Minister Paul Martin issued a statement "vigorously condemning" the "appalling" comments by Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. "These statements are irresponsible, contrary to Canadian values and have no place in the discourse of member states of the United Nations," Martin stated.

"His revisionist position goes against the fundamental principles of human rights and is contrary to historical fact."

The Canadian government, he noted, called in the Iranian chargé d'affaires, "to express outrage at the [Iranian] president's comments... Canada once again urges Iran's president to refrain from spreading messages of hate and to show more restraint, tolerance and realism. Canada wishes to be clear that it will never accept anti-Semitism in any form."

Conservative leader Stephen Harper said in a news release, "The entire civilized world must be repulsed by these sentiments, particularly as they are being expressed by the head of state of a member state of the United Nations."

He urged the "world community, including the United Nations, [to] speak with clarity and resolve in the face of these irresponsible and hateful remarks. These attacks underscore the need for the world community to support a just settlement in the Middle East that includes a secure Israel and a democratic Palestinian state."

New Democratic Party leader Jack Layton said "these are deeply, deeply disturbing comments that Canadians would absolutely not associate with and must not."

Ahmadinejad's latest broadside came on live television during a tour of Zahedan in southeastern Iran. The Iranian president said Europeans had created "a myth in the name of Holocaust and consider it to be above God, religion and the prophets.

"If you committed this big crime, they why should the oppressed Palestinian nation pay the price? This is our proposal: if you committed the crime, then give a part of your own land in Europe, the United States, Canada or Alaska to them so that the Jews can establish their country."

Those remarks came only days after Ahmadinejad suggested Israel could be established in Germany and Austria. In October, he called for Israel to be "wiped off the map."

Ahmadinejad's comments solidified concerns in Israel over Iran's nuclear program and prompted speculation about a pre-emptive attack. The London Sunday Times reported – and the Israeli government denied – that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had ordered the military to prepare a strike by the end of March. However, Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, head of Israeli military intelligence, reportedly told a Knesset committee that "if Iran's nuclear efforts are not halted by the end of March 2006, there will be no more reason for diplomatic activity."

Jewish organizations also raised concerns over Iran's nuclear program. The Los-Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center stated, "Not since Adolf Hitler has the head of a sovereign state used his position so openly to threaten the Jewish people with genocide." It urged its supporters to call on Jan Eliasson, president of the UN General Assembly, to convene the UN's 191 member states "to censure Iran and declare its president persona non grata."

In Toronto, Leo Adler, spokesperson for the Canadian branch of the Wiesenthal Center, applauded the party leaders' quick response to the Iranian president's remarks.

Superb historical fiction

From the editor's desk

In late September I received an e-mail from a friendly reader, Jeffrey Paul, who enthusiastically recommended that I read and possibly review The Last Kabbalist of Lisbon by Richard Zimler.

He described the book as "a fabulous read and educational. [It] deals with life for the converted Jews, the 'New Christians' in Portugal around the year 1500, and traces the lives of the Zarco family through the narration of Berekiah Zarco."

Subsequently, my e-mail correspondent told me of two other historical novels by Zimler, Guardian of the Dawn and Hunting Midnight, each revolving around one of Zarco's descendants.

My curiosity was piqued. The subjects interested me and I was flattered that Jeffrey Paul had made the effort, with no gain for himself, to tell me about the books.

Thus, I acquired all three novels and read them consecutively over a period of some weeks. I had to actually force myself to put them down. Each was a compelling literary experience.

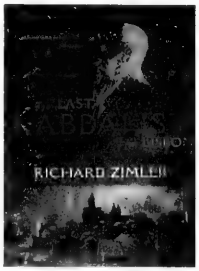
The Last Kabbalist of Lisbon (Overlook Press, 1998) is set against the background of the massacre in Lisbon, in April 1506, of some 2,000 New Christians, Jews who had been forcibly converted in 1497 by King Manuel. Many, if not most of the New Christians were secret Jews who treasured the traditions of their forebears and practised them even at great risk to themselves and to family.

The story begins brilliantly with an author's note purporting to explain how Berekiah Zarco's manuscript – the very novel that the reader proceeds to read - was discovered by Zimler. It is an introductory tale within the tale. And with that beginning flourish, the reader enters the late Middle Ages world of Catholic Europe across whose spired and steepled landscape lies the terrifying shadow of the Inquisition.

At its core, the story is a murder mystery. But it is also much more. It is a work of history, theology and literature that moves with lightning speed. And yet the mystery is merely the vehicle. The descriptive power of the novel is remarkable.

Hunting Midnight (Delta Trade Paperbacks, 2003) tells the story of John Zarco Stewart some three centuries later, in 19th century Portugal, through London and then to pre-Civil War America.

Religious intolerance and the spectre of Inquisition once again casts a pall on the descendants of the Jews in Iberia.



Midnight is a person, not a time of day, the name of an African healer and a freed slave who is brought into the family by John's father and loved as a member of the family.

This story, too, is a mystery but of betrayal, not murder. Its larger theme, however, is that of justice and love. It moves rapidly and with unforeseen twists and turns like a river ceaselessly flowing through lush mountain and forest.

Guardian of the Dawn (Delta Trade Paperbacks, 2005) is set in the late 16th and early 17th centuries, in the exotic world of colonial India. Tiago Zarco's family has escaped religious oppression in Europe. But it follows them and intrudes upon his family with maniacal and brutal evil.

Zarco and his father are betrayed, imprisoned and tortured. Who betrayed them?

As with Kabbalist and Hunting Midnight, the story holds the reader's interest like a vice grip. But the plot is only part of the reading pleasure. The research into and detail of the period and the place of the stories are a great splendour in and of themselves.

Zimler is a superb writer. The stories soar with an arcing, though aching and tearful trajectory through the chambers of the reader's heart.

Born in New York, Zimler now lives in Portugal, where he is associate professor at the University of Porto. His books have been widely acclaimed in the United States, receiving high praise from reviewers at the Wall Street Journal, the New York Times and Newsday, to name but a few.

After I read the books, I e-mailed Jeffrey Paul thanking him for having recommended the Zimler books to me. I felt a debt of gratitude to him that required acknowledgment.

He responded promptly and politely. His words are a fitting conclusion to this tribute to the writing of Richard Zimler.

"I am very gratified to hear that you appreciate and enjoy Richard's novels, as I have. As a matter of fact, you are not in my debt at all. We are in Richard's debt, not really a debt in the colloquial or conventional sense, but a profound moral debt, to someone who has taken the trouble, and to someone who has the talent and intestinal fortitude to do all the historical research of our people's stories and then compose a beautiful and interesting narrative as the medium through which this obscure history is to be conveyed. And on all levels, Richard succeeds admirably."

I whole-heartedly agree with Paul and, as he did, I recommend the Zimler oeuvre to anyone seeking enthralling, entertaining reading.

Canada's role in Darfur not seen as election issue with parties

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's still fairly early in the federal election campaign, but one issue that seems to have completely slipped under the radar of the mainstream political parties and the media is the calamitous situation in Darfur.

Election 2006

As many as 10,000 Sudanese refugees continue to be killed each and every month by roving bands of janjaweed, militias supported by the government in Khartoum, said Dr. Norman Epstein, founder of C.A.S.T.S. (Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan).

While Canada has advanced the "responsibility to protect" doctrine, which gives countries the right to intervene in the internal affairs of other nations to prevent atrocities, political parties and voters have turned a blind eye to the ongoing mayhem in Darfur, he said.

Epstein said C.A.S.T.S. is hoping to make the situation in Darfur – which he has characterized as an "African Auschwitz" – into a campaign issue. The group is putting together a "primer" on events in Africa so that voters, armed with the information, can "raise it in town halls."

C.A.S.T.S putting together a 'primer' on events in Africa so voters can 'raise it in town halls'

Mark Weintraub, Canadian Jewish Congress' spokesman on Darfur, is likewise disappointed in Canada's tepid response to the ongoing genocide.

It now appears too much stock was placed on peace talks that have made little progress, with the result that the janjaweed continue to rampage and refugees continue to suffer, he said.

"We see that the sense of satisfaction that there would be an end to the killing has turned to disappointment," Weintraub said in a telephone interview from Vancouver.

Canada's political parties are ignoring Darfur. "It is not an election issue," he said. "It must be an election issue and we will do our best to make it an election issue."

To mid-December, the campaign has focused primarily on domestic concerns, including child care, health issues, crime and corruption – with some America-bashing thrown in. Little has been said on Canada's deployment of troops to Afghanistan, let alone on foreign policy on Darfur.

Epstein said some progress on the Darfur file was made early in the year. Canada raised the issue in international fora, it sent a handful of support troops to the region as well as armoured personnel carriers (they languish in Senegal as the Sudanese government refuses to allow them to enter) and it pledged $380 million (since 2000) for Darfur refugees and the African Union (AU) military force. It also appointed an advisory team that includes Sen. Roméo Dallaire, former head of UN forces in Rwanda, and the prime minister has named a Special Envoy for Peace in Sudan, Sen. Mobina Jaffer.

But it can do much more. "It should walk the walk and not just talk the talk," he said.

Canada remains in a good position to exercise its unique leverage to move things ahead, Epstein continued. Canada has good diplomatic relations with the United States, the European Union and with African nations.

A multinational force must be put in place to protect aid convoys and NGO workers.

Ottawa, he said, seems to be "putting all its eggs in the AU basket." However, the AU force does not have the mandate to actually prevent the janjaweed from slaughtering innocent Africans (they are there as ceasefire observers), nor does it have sufficient military strength or logistical support to intervene, he said.

"Things have really stalled and the situation is even unravelling more. There is more insecurity in Darfur," he said. Civilians continue to be murdered and even those who have fled to refugee camps are in danger.

Meanwhile, the international community's policies continue to employ "bizarre logic." At the same time that many members of the Khartoum regime face indictment by the International Criminal Court, "the international community continues to negotiate with those genocidaires for permission to go in and protect civilians and provide aid. The Khartoum regime is obstructing that," Epstein said.

Weintraub said Congress will re-evaluate its advocacy program in coming weeks after it is briefed by contacts returning from Darfur. In the meantime it is attempting to co-ordinate its advocacy efforts with the American Jewish World Service, a humanitarian NGO.

Websites of the three major parties make only passing reference to Darfur.

The prime minister's website states, "protecting civilians in armed conflict and ensuring that the international community is equipped to deliver effectively on its responsibility to protect are top priorities of Canada's foreign policy."

WHAT MAKES A GREAT SCHOOL GREAT?
great parents

My husband Michael and I didn't have the opportunity ourselves to attend Jewish Day School but we wanted to ensure that Jewish values, tradition and heritage were instilled in our children. We chose Associated because of its fine educational and communal reputation.

Our kids, Adeena, Ahsher and Noam, are benefiting from their experience at Associated. They are learning and being challenged and most importantly, we see the Jewish values and knowledge they are bringing into our home. Michael and I are learning along side our children and our whole family has created wonderful friendships at Associated.

This year, we are seeing great things happening at the school and the positive impact that these changes are having on our children. Because of Associated, we see a bright future for our children and look forward to not only our kids becoming alumni, but hope to see the day our grandchildren graduate from Associated as well.

Mock, Farber named to group to study hate crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Ontario government has appointed a nine-person committee to study ways of countering hate crimes and improving services for hate crime victims.

The committee will be chaired by Karen Mock, former national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights. One of the committee members is Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress and an expert on anti-Semitism and extremist groups.

The committee has a six- to eight-month mandate and will gather information to determine best practices across the country, said Mock, who has also served as executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. It is charged with developing a set of practical recommendations and guidelines that could be implemented in the province. Among the priorities to be examined will be how to improve reporting of hate crimes, how to ensure victims are better served and what proactive steps should be taken to educate the public and police.

Mock said committee members each bring a unique set of skills and knowledge to the table. She expects they can put their knowledge to good use by building on current practices so that government does not have to "reinvent the wheel" when it comes to addressing hate crimes.

Farber said both the Dalton McGuinty government and the prior Mike Harris government have shown "they are taking the issue of hate crimes seriously."

Farber said he is considering suggesting the committee examine whether Ontario police units are well-trained in addressing hate crimes and whether they share information with each other. Only a few Ontario police forces are currently linked in the Hate Crime Extremism Investigative Team, he said.

In August, the McGuinty government announced it was providing $200,000 to the Hate Crime Extremism Investigative Team, a body that co-ordinates intelligence information among five Ontario police departments. At the same time, Monte Kwinter, minister of community safety and correctional services, said the team would expand to include 10 police forces. The expanded investigative team includes police units in Toronto, York, Durham, Halton and Oxford, as well as London, Waterloo, Guelph, Hamilton and Ottawa.

Creation of the new advisory group was announced in advance of International Human Rights Day earlier this month. "These nine individuals are representative of our diverse Ontario communities and are well-placed to recommend ways to improve services for victims of hate crimes and prevent further victimization," said Attorney General Michael Bryant. "The McGuinty government has zero tolerance for crimes of hate. The advice of this distinguished panel will help strengthen our ability to fight these crimes."

"The experienced individuals who will sit on our Hate Crimes Community Working Group will provide valuable advice to help support our government's commitment to tolerance and equality – the building blocks of strong and prosperous communities," Kwinter said.

In addition to Mock and Farber, the committee includes Marie Chen, Germaine Elliott, Ijaz Qamar, Uzma Shakir, Howard Shulman, Anne-Marie Stewart and Jane Tallim.

Miracles perhaps, but resolve always

Calendar year 2005 winds down in the whirl of a number of important events unfolding in the Middle East. And as we know from the pages of history, ancient and recent, what starts there seldom ends there.

Last weekend, Israel's 77-year-old Prime Minister Ariel Sharon suffered what the media described as a minor stroke. As of this writing, his aides downplayed any permanent disabling impact on the prime minister's ability to function and to lead. But the sudden illness will necessarily become an issue in the upcoming election. The prime minister's health will now become as much of an issue for voters as his policies because those policies are so manifestly and so intricately tied to the man himself.

One of the new developments that those policies must address is the seemingly surging support for Hamas among ordinary, rank and file Palestinians. Hamas outperformed the other parties in West Bank municipal elections last week and is hoping to capitalize on the higher municipal profile in the upcoming broader elections for the Legislative Council.The flip side of this unpleasant two-headed coin is the seemingly slipping support for the Fatah party of Mahmoud Abbas.

Hamas' Syrian-based leader Khaled Mashaal last week repeated his organization's determination to fulfil Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's insistent aspiration that Israel "be wiped off the map." In fact, Mashaal was reported to have been a guest of the government and of military officials in Iran last week. It is not likely he and his hosts discussed humanitarian relief for the victims of Darfur or pollution abatement efforts under the Kyoto Accord. To even the most starry-eyed, anti-Israel apologist, it should be apparent that the level of co-operation and co-ordination between the Tehrani underwriters of terrorism and the terrorists themselves is becoming bolder and more publicly pronounced.

When one adds a nuclear ingredient to the toxic, anti-Jewish, anti-Israel stew cooking in Ahmadinejad's seething mind, it is not an overstatement to say that the Jewish people inside and outside Israel face worrisome developments over the horizon of the incoming new year.

But worrisome developments, as we all know, are not new to us. They are the dark, blotchety droplets of ink that spill so frequently onto the pages of Jewish history. At this time of year, however, we are reminded by the Chanukah candles we will soon be lighting, how to respond to them.

It is true that we can see miracles on the pages of our past. But we must also see – and rely more upon – the resolve, courage and determination of a small, often besieged people that enabled those miracles to happen.

A Canadian Jewish Congress task force on small communities recommended the establishment of a permanent national committee with a part-time staffer to help these communities survive. Other suggestions included grants for religious, educational and cultural programs, training seminars, a national newsletter and cross-country educational and cultural tours.

Sleeping in democracy

Are the nations of the world appeasing the president of Iran or just paying him homage to reap the rewards, as is Russia, by aiding Iran's nuclear escapades?

How can we disregard the virulent rhetoric of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran's president, as he threatens to annihilate the Jewish state and expounds upon his hatred of the West? The mullahcracy of Iran is a known sponsor of world terror. Such statements of extermination by a president of a United Nations member nation is not just a threat to Israel, it is a threat to the world.

On July 25, on Iranian TV Channel 1, Ahmadinejad praised the martyrdom of suicide bombers, saying, "Islam will conquer all the mountaintops of the world." His latest proposal is to remove Israelis from Israel and resettle them in a new location in the centre of Europe that "he" would re-name "Israel." He claims that Israelis are indigenous to Europe, while he disregards the majority Sephardi population who have always lived in Israel or who lived in the region around the Mediterranean. Of course, Ahmadinejad's plan shows a disregard for the Europeans that he would displace. He is willing to reign over this planet if we let him.

Those who sleep in democracy will wake up in tyranny.

Anti-Semitism not only cause of Holocaust

Reviewing the memoirs of George Jonas, Beethoven's Mask, Sheldon Kirshner finds it strange that its author "first became aware of the Holocaust after his immigration to Canada" in 1956 ("Jonas speaks his mind in a pungent memoir," CJN, Dec. 15). "I thought it was just gentiles killing Jews," Jonas quips, tongue in cheek. But, mind you, the term Holocaust as a referent to the Shoah, the Nazi genocide of the Jews, spread only slowly after the war. As late as the 1970s, the Holocaust entry is absent from the World Book Encyclopedia and even from Nathan Ausubel's Pictorial History of the Jewish People. The phenomenon often precedes its name.

The reviewer calls Jonas' view that anti-Semitism alone does not explain the Nazi Holocaust a "fatuous claim." However, the fact is that in Poland and Hungary, for example, anti-Semitism exceeded that of Germany, and in spite of the long history of the hatred of Jews in other countries as well, it did not result in a catastrophe comparable to the Shoah. The incomprehensible crime of the Holocaust was perpetrated by a unique combination of anti-Semitism with eugenics and social Darwinism, particularly the idea of the survival of the fittest. Moreover, the genocide was organized and implemented with the total support of the state, the military, the police, the medical establishment, industry and the railway system. Anti-Semitism alone sure was not enough.

I might be wrong on this, but the reviewer seems to belittle the sufferings of people under Communism. The concept of the dictatorship of the proletariat is a cornerstone of Marxism and "applied Marxism" did not produce in Europe or elsewhere benign regimes. Communists rule by enslavement and terror. After all, historians estimate that Stalin murdered more people than Hitler did.

Hats off to Chabad!

Regarding Frances Kraft's article "Chabad launches Mississauga minchah minyan" (CJN, Dec. 15), I grew up often hearing my father speak of Mississauga, as that is where his office was located.

Part of his working there entailed planning his lunches, as there was no kosher food in Mississauga, and very often, calculating where to catch a midday minyan. To Rabbi and Rebbitzen Slavin, and to all of Chabad, I salute you, for continually going where no other Orthodox Jews venture.

Should donors rein in academic extremists?

By STEVEN PLAUT

North Americans were stunned when the story emerged of Ward Churchill at the University of Colorado, who justified the 9-11 attacks on the United States and described the victims of those attacks as "Little Eichmanns." They were even more shocked to see the numbers of academic extremists rushing out to show solidarity with Churchill, not because they wanted to defend free speech but because they agreed with the contents of what he said.

What has not been appreciated by and large by the Jewish communities in North America is the extent to which political extremism has taken root so deeply inside Israeli universities as well. In many ways, academic extremism in Israel is much worse than that in North America. After all, Israel is in the middle of a war for its very existence. The pronouncements by campus extremists in North America do not really do real harm. Those by Israeli extremists are picked up within moments by anti-Semites, Arab terrorists and others, and used as propaganda weapons on behalf of the war to annihilate Israel.

Documentation of the activities and statements of Israeli academic extremists is now available online, archived and organized by a group calling itself "Israel Academia Monitor." It is Israel's new cousin to the "Campus Watch" website that operates in the U.S., itself long controversial because of its practice of publishing some of the loopier citations and statements made by faculty members in North America who pose as Middle East "experts." Israel Academia Monitor provides a well-documented record of the most outrageous statements and most seditious activities of Israel's own academic extremists. The information is organized by campus and makes no secret of its desire to see the information reach donors to those universities, as well as alumni, journalists and others. And it has Israel's academic extremists running scared.

Campus Watch has long been denounced for its "McCarthyism" by those who object to its activities. Similar denunciations of critics of the Israeli academic left are becoming more common. And free speech is precisely what the hysteria is all about, namely, the right to free speech for critics of the extremists! Israel's far leftists believe firmly in their right to denounce Israel as a Nazi-like, oppressive, racist country, all this during a time of war, but not of anyone else to criticize them. The extreme left has been attempting to silence the critics of the anti-Zionists, much the way Communists have always tried to delegitimize anti-communism as "anti-democratic."

The attacks on Israel Academia Monitor (and Campus Watch) are coming from people who insist that in the name of democracy they have the right to endorse terror, collaborate with and promote anti-Semitism, promote law breaking, demand that Israel be annihilated, and use their classrooms to impose their extremist political agenda on their hapless students, all within the rubric of free speech and academic freedom. Free speech for "progressive" me but none for "reactionary" thee.

When the British Association of University Teachers (AUT) declared a boycott of two Israeli universities last year (later reversed), it turned out that the main initiators were themselves Israeli tenured academics, one in particular from the same University of Haifa targeted by the boycott. Other Israeli academics have long been calling for "divestment" and international boycotts of Israel in general.

The British AUT saga was only one manifestation of the growing academic plague of extremism. The international "divestment" and "boycott" campaigns against Israel have shone light on Israel's academic extremists and helped bring to public attention the damage they cause. Many of these people endorse boycotts of their own universities, and quite a few openly endorse Arab terrorism against Israelis. They continue to draw salaries at state-financed universities, funded by the very same taxpayers who are targeted by Arab terrorists.

Four Israeli universities are today the centres of anti-Israel tenured extremism (nearly all of the extremists by the way are leftist Jews; few Arabs are as venomously outspoken), although each of the other schools also has a few such people. Many academic extremists have been part of the international campaign to boycott Israel. Most have been involved in attempts to organize mutiny and insurrection among Israeli soldiers, and promoting refusal to serve in the army until Israel adopts the policies endorsed by its Arab Communist parties. The four are Ben-Gurion University, Tel Aviv University, the University of Haifa, and the Hebrew University. The other universities have fewer anti-Israel fanatics, although they too contain some.

Several Israeli faculty members have been jailed for their activities: one was arrested for interfering with anti-terror operations of the Israeli army, several were arrested for refusal to serve in the army and one was recently arrested for being part of a violent attack on Israeli soldiers by international "anarchists."

Some Israeli academics have openly endorsed the activities of Tali Fahima, the Jewish woman now in Israeli prison for aiding the planning of terrorist atrocities by her Jenin "boyfriend." A few professors in Israel nominated her for a Nobel Prize! Other Israeli professors openly endorse Mordecai Vanunu, recently released from Israeli prison after serving a long sentence for espionage against Israel. Limor Livnat, Israel's minister of education, has spoken out against the campus anti-Israel extremists and has denounced several by name for exploiting their classrooms for purposes of anti-Israel indoctrination. She boycotted a meeting of the board of governors of Ben-Gurion University after one of its faculty members published articles in Europe claiming that Israel is guilty of "symbolic genocide" when it targets Hamas terror commanders.

In other cases, classrooms at Israeli universities are misused by the radicals to impose their extremist views on their students. One professor at my own university told his students in class that Israeli soldiers are Nazis, and several professors at other universities have been cited in the media for saying similar things. At another university, a professor granted automatic exemption from exams and homework to students in prison for refusing to serve in the army, but not to students doing reserve duty. Some professors have come out openly in justifying and rationalizing Palestinian terror attacks against Jewish civilians. At least one academic has openly endorsed Hezbollah rocket attacks on Israel. Dozens of Israeli professors now endorse the "one-state solution," also known as the Rwanda solution, whereby Israel would simply be eliminated altogether and folded into a larger Palestinian state with an Arab majority.

These are only a small sample of illustrations of the growing problem. A far more detailed and fully-documented exposure of these people can be found on the website operated by Israel Academia Monitor, at www.israel-academia-monitor.com. The Monitor expresses the desire for donors to Israeli universities to review the material and make their views heard. That is what enrages the radicals. But what is wrong with donors also having freedom of speech? Should not donors take responsibility for and a moral interest in how their generosity is misused by politicized academics at "their" universities?

Let us be clear.

No one is denying freedom of speech nor academic freedom to extremists, even though there are serious questions as to whether their activities always fall within the category of protected speech. During World War II, Oswald Mosley, founder of the British Union of Fascists, and his people were not granted academic lectureships in the United Kingdom when Winston Churchill was prime minister, and Lord Haw-Haw was never granted an honorary PhD as a celebration of free speech. I doubt there are many European countries in which an avowed Holocaust denier could hold a university lectureship today, although in Israel at least one admirer of Norman Finkelstein does.

Outside Israel, academic freedom does seem to have its boundaries. Many European countries have laws making expressions of anti-Semitism a crime. Israel has a law against open endorsement of terror violence, and an "anti-racism" law. While Kahanists and radicals from the Israeli fringe right have been indicted, no Israeli leftist has ever been indicted under it. Why not?

Many of the leftist extremists on Israeli campus have embarrassing academic records, consisting of little more than political propaganda misrepresented as scholarly research, yet they enter the system and stay around thanks to the political solidarity by other academic leftists.

There is a great difference between affirming their rights to free speech and insisting that taxpayers and others have to foot the bills for their hostile polemics. Israeli universities are all (with one exception) state-financed, with foreign donors covering what the taxpayer does not. Taxpayers and donors have the right to demand accountability and to resist being coerced into financing sedition and radicalism.

Critics of the Israeli far left and donors to Israeli universities should be as entitled to express their opinions as the extremists and radicals themselves. Israeli professors unhappy with this should move to the Palestinian Bir Zeit University where they can preach their ideas to those who will appreciate them.

The legacy of Hakoah Vienna

Now available on video, the documentary Watermarks recounts the amazing story of eight elderly Jewish women who, in their prime, achieved great success as swimmers in their native Austria.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Having escaped Europe just before World War II began, the eight friends settled in different parts of the world. And while the commonality of their upbringing and the experiences they shared as champion swimmers created among them a unique and lasting kinship, their communication became inevitably less consistent as time passed.

It was left to the ingenuity of writer and director Yaron Zilberman to once again unite them and to bring them back to Vienna – to the haunts of their youth and to the very pool where they had trained and competed. With poignancy and dramatic understatement, we see them swimming their ceremonial laps as the film nears its end.

But inasmuch as Watermarks serves primarily as a tribute to a group of remarkable women, and deservedly so, it serves as well to cast a spotlight on the illustrious sports club that all of them represented during their swimming careers.

Hakoah Vienna was founded in 1909 as a response to the notorious Aryan Paragraph that prohibited Austrian clubs from accepting Jewish athletes. From relatively humble beginnings, Hakoah grew rapidly into one of Europe's largest sports organizations. In addition to its famous swimmers, who dominated national competitions during the 1930s, Hakoah became widely recognized for its accomplishment in many other sports as well.

In 1924, the Hakoah soccer team became the first to beat an English squad on British soil, and a year later, the same team went on to win the Austrian championships. The Hakoah water polo team was the prevailing force in national meets between 1926 and 1928, and a Hakoah wrestler brought home two bronze medals from the 1932 Olympics.

When Austria was annexed by Germany in 1938, Hakoah was disbanded. During its abbreviated lifespan, the club (according to a film synopsis of Watermarks) "embodied the full complexity of Jewish experience in Austrian culture" and "represented the revival of the Jewish body as a vehicle for community and national identity." More is the tragedy and more is the sobering lesson, therefore, that only 39 members of Hakoah survived the ensuing Shoah.

As a final footnote to the Hakoah Vienna narrative, it was agreed in 2001 that, as part of a Holocaust compensation package, the former Hakoah sports field would be re-established on land provided by the city of Vienna.

In announcing the initiative, Austria's Special envoy for Restitution Issues, Ernst Sucharipa, "recognized the tremendous symbolic value of this particular measure as a testimony to the vitality of the Jewish community of Austria."

The lion lies down with lambs

It is with a deep sense of gratitude that I look back on the opportunity I've been afforded to experience first-hand the miracle of Jewish national rebirth. And as if that, in and of itself, were not enough excitement for one brief lifetime, suddenly I'm getting the sense that I might also be around for the final and crowing event in the Jewish redemptive calendar. From my vantage point, at least, it's looking very much like the onset of the End Times Golden Age the prophets of the Bible promised us.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

There are, of course, certain basic prerequisites that must be met in order for us to be certain that the Kingdom of Heaven is upon us, and that we are, indeed, on the threshold of the millennium we've all been waiting for so anxiously these past few thousand years. Not the least of them is the termination of strife and discord – the end of war, beating swords into plowshares and all that stuff. The lamb will lie down with the lion.

And lo and behold, seated before the TV munching on dinner, I saw it happen. I darn near kaplutzed! Call me a liar if the cuddliest of lambs didn't snuggle right up to the lion as though it was a harmless pussycat. The first and most gentle lamb, MK Yossi Beilin, with a Meretz-style cherubic look on his face, began to lick, slobber and baa-baa a tribute to that hitherto dreaded and ferocious feline, Kadima's Ariel Sharon, right on public television. Beilin is not the only sheep to be doing this, of course. A whole flock of darlings – Laborites Haim Ramon and Shimon Peres included – have sidled up recently to the unchallenged king of the political jungle.

Oh my! Something of note is taking place in Israeli society, and by extension, its politics, when the flower children of yesteryear start bunking up with the infamous "warlord" Sharon.

Admittedly, much of the ferocity has gone out of the lion's roar in his advancing old age. There are even moments when, in jolly grandfatherly fashion, the one-time crusader-expansionist mews a bit like a conciliatory kitten about "painful concessions" and "two states" and "peace, peace, peace" and "safeguarding a Jewish majority."

And it's been a long time since last he pranced over hill and dale throughout the West Bank (Forgive me! I meant Judea and Samaria! How could I forget?) while, with sweeping gestures of his massive arm and an unquenchable fury in his eyes, he made bold statements about "the greater Land of Israel" and, with gaping maw, bit off more territory for the Jewish people than the Jews themselves could chew or swallow. He's even stopped growling altogether about how the Kingdom of Jordan, and not Palestine, is the real Palestinian state.

Alas, hard realities have bruised the old bruiser. And as for the lambs, well, they ain't bleating quite so meekly as once they did, either. The pervasive stench of blood and burning flesh in the slaughterhouse of Israeli streets has turned the stomachs of not just a few benign and sweetly yelping herbivores. Fangs, if only the tiniest ones, can be spotted poking through their soft gums.

Four brutal years have taken a toll on all the animals in our tiny corner of the forest. Most have migrated to a more sensible and sober place in the middle ground, where the public is already grazing and beating some, if not yet all, of its swords into plowshares.

And take a look at the Likud, will ya. The exodus is rapidly turning into a panic-stricken flight from a sinking ship. The ideological "hardliners" and rank-and-file stalwarts are looking so terribly bewildered and forlorn, as they stand there in stunned confusion watching the train speed on by them into the future.

Wait a second! Am I mistaken, or did I actually hear Shinui's Tommy Lapid whisper sweet nothings to Shas, like two desperate lovers off in the shadows? Can't be!

Yes, people, it is the dawning of Salvation. Love, sweet love is breaking out all over the place. No more lions, no more lambs.

My, oh my! The things one lives to see!

Israel's next political big bang

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's dramatic departure from Likud to form a new party, Kadima, and the huge impact it's had on Israel's political system has kept Israelis enthralled for weeks. Sharon took one-third of the Likud Knesset faction with him, as well as Shimon Peres and other MKs and ministers from Labor. This finally looks like the "big bang" pundits have anticipated for many years.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But beyond the personalities and policies, these developments are also harbingers of long-overdue structural reform. Israel's political system has not changed for more than 100 years – since the days of Theodor Herzl, when there was no state to govern and the Polish approach to democracy was considered state of the art.

There was no need then for a strong political centre, and as a result, we now have 14, 15 or perhaps even 16 parties (it's hard to keep up) in the Knesset. It's amazing that the system has worked at all in Israel's hypersensitive environment of external threats and internal divisions between religious and secular, old timers and immigrants, Ashkenazim and Sephardim, etc.

But 20 years ago, once the founding fathers – former prime ministers David Ben-Gurion and Menachem Begin – had passed from the scene, we reached political gridlock. Since 1992, Israel has had six prime ministers, and we're now heading into our sixth national election. Both Likud and Labor seem to have more candidates for prime minister than dues-paying members. This is no way to run even an ordinary, boring country, and Israel is neither ordinary nor boring.

At the same time, the Israeli public has moved a long way during this period and has become more pragmatic and less ideological. Sharon discovered that most Israelis recognize the need for change: neither the status quo – and responsibility for the lives of millions of Arabs – nor messianic peace promises would work.

This accelerated the process leading to the big bang. First, on the left, the Labor party split between the realists and dreamers, who left to join Meretz, and left the voters behind. Amir Peretz's surprise victory over Peres in Labor's leadership vote by a margin of 1,500 votes reflected the extreme weakness of Labor rather than a grand victory by a new and popular national leader.

Then, it was Likud's turn to undergo a similar split between ideologues (on the right) and pragmatists. The opposition to disengagement was intense – not enough to give former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu the votes to overthrow Sharon, but certainly enough to block passage of the next budget and prevent the government from functioning. This threat is what led Sharon to reluctantly leave Likud and set up a new party fixed squarely in the centre of the Israeli political spectrum and made up of religious and secular Jews, Ashkenazim and Sephardim, and representatives from all other sectors.

But the main source of gridlock in Israeli politics is not the division between ideologues and pragmatists. The root of the problem is a 19th-century political structure based on amorphous and easily corrupted parties that lack accountability.

As a result, even a major victory for Kadima will not necessarily provide a solution. For the "big bang" to succeed, Sharon, Peres and their associates in this new adventure will have to put most of their energies into finally changing the country's political system. Israelis have been waiting for 57 years to vote for regional representatives to the Knesset.

It's far too early to predict how all of this will turn out, but the good news is that there is hope. New faces are starting to emerge who are emphasizing co-operation between different segments of Israeli society rather than polarization. And Israelis are revelling in the new politics, because there are finally some opportunities for making positive changes. This alone is worth the price of admission.

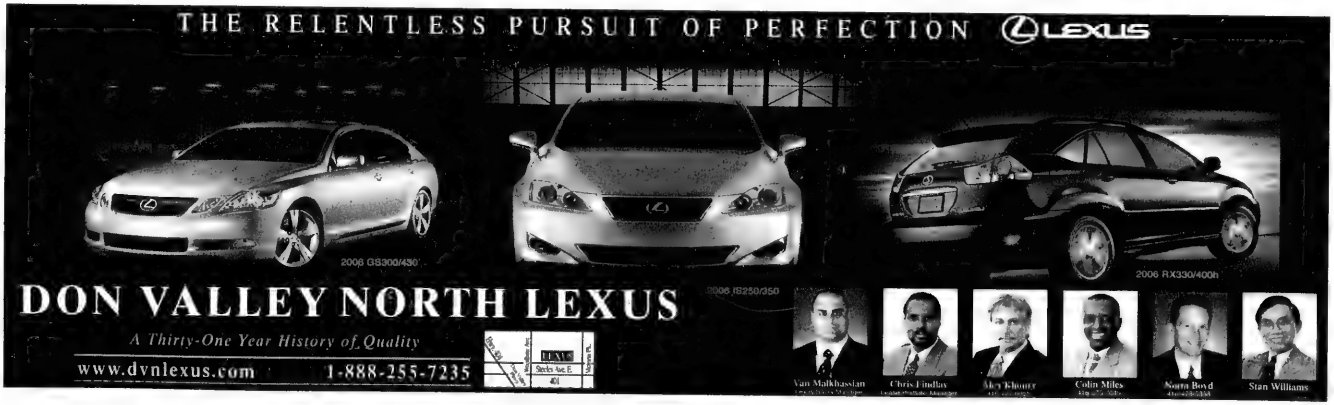
Alexander (Sasha) Gomelsky, the father of modern basketball in the Soviet Union and a member of the U.S. Basketball Hall of Fame, won four Olympic medals as a coach in 1964, 1968, 1970 and 1988. He also coached three national Soviet teams. Sonny Hertzberg, a City College basketball guard, was the New York Knicks' scoring leader in the 1946-47 season. Norman Mager helped the 1950 City College basketball squad win the National Collegiate Athletic Association championship. Solly Cantor, a Toronto boxer, won Canada's 1951 lightweight crown and was inducted into the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame. Maxie Spoon, a Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame member, was a Golden Gloves and middleweight champion from Montreal.

Preston Robert Tisch, a former U.S. postmaster general, was a principal of the multi-billion dollar, New York-based Loews Corporation whom some credit with coining the phrase "power breakfast." Jake Superstein, an Edmonton businessman and real estate developer, was the founder of Alexandra Petroleum Ltd. Abe Hirschfeld, a flamboyant New York real estate magnate who briefly acquired the New York Post in 1993, ran unsuccessfully for political offices. Norman Raab was the co-founder of the Villager line of classic preppy women's clothing.

Jacob Trobe directed humanitarian relief programs in postwar Germany and Italy for the American Joint Distribution Committee and was one of the first civilians to enter the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. Franzi Groszmann was one of the last survivors of the parents who placed their children on trains in the Kindertransport rescue project from 1938 to 1940. Lisa Fittko guided Jewish and non-Jewish refugees, including the literary critic Walter Benjamin, from France to Spain in 1940 and 1941. Frederik Jacques Philips, the former president of the Dutch electronics company that bears his name, saved hundreds of Jews during the Holocaust.

Cyril Harris, the former chief rabbi of South Africa, was a close friend of Nelson Mandela and spoke at his presidential inauguration in 1994.

J.B. Stoner, an anti-Semitic propagandist in the United States, was a founder of the National States Rights party and ran for vice-president on its ticket in 1964, receiving 6,980 of 70.6 million votes cast.



Born to teach: experience dates back to childhood

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although Esther Etigson teaches junior high – an admittedly demanding job – she says she doesn't have to raise her voice to control her class.

Her personal warmth, evidenced by positive comments to students about everything from their haircuts to efforts at schoolwork, combined with her refusal to brook any nonsense, have set the tone in her class for almost 30 years at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Etigson took over her first classroom when she was just a Grade 6 student at Beit Yaakov, a religious girls' school in Haifa. "I remember the principal sending me to grade 1 and 2 classes if a teacher didn't make it in on time."

By that time, she had already taken on her first student as a tutor, a project for which the enterprising youngster, the third in a family of seven, received 50 gruschim – about the equivalent of 50 cents – per hour.

A native of Morocco who immigrated to Israel with her family at the age of six months, Etigson initially resisted becoming a teacher. She registered to study interior design and architecture for the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, but instead returned to Beit Yaakov to attend their teachers' program. "I loved it," she said.

After graduating as a teacher of English and Hebrew, the newly minted 20-year-old educator came to Canada in the summer of 1969 to work for a year as a private Hebrew tutor for a local family. She wanted "to see the world ," and perfect her English.

It was that year that she met Lawrence Etigson, a Torontonian then working on his PhD. They were married in 1971, but she was widowed at a young age.

In 1976, when their son, Uri, now a rabbi in Israel, was just a toddler, Etigson sought a teaching position at Associated. Her husband was already ill, and her telephone inquiries about finding a job had not led anywhere.

Without an appointment, she knocked on the office door of Rabbi Akiva Egozi, the school's educational director, with whom she hadn't yet been in touch, and asked for five minutes of his time. "So rude and bold!" she exclaims now, as if she can't quite believe what she did.

That year, she took on her first class in Toronto – a group of Grade 1 students. Since then, she has taught grades 2, 5, 6, 7 and 8. Currently she teaches grade 7 and 8 Torah, Chumash and Toda'ah (customs and laws).

Etigson, who received a Teacher of Excellence award (a privately sponsored award recognizing Jewish day school teachers) in 2002, says it's important to deal with children in a way that's fair and consistent. She believes that "kids need structure, limits and privileges."

A significant privilege she offers her students is the chance to be treated as young adults, she said. "I teach them mutual respect."

> A lesson from the teacher: " I think every kid has a potential. You just have to find it. If you haven't found it, it doesn't mean it's not there."

From the first day of class, her students know the rules, as well as the meaning of the small bell she rings to let them know that class is about to begin. "I used it in Grade 1, and it works just as well in Grade 7."

Recently, Etigson has rediscovered a love for painting, which – along with Shabbat and gardening – balances the time she spends as a teacher.

Over the years she's been involved in other creative pursuits – ceramics, macramé, jewellery-making – but it was an evening course in water colours that she took eight years ago that led her to become an accomplished painter, mostly of water colour landscapes, and more recently abstract acrylics.

She finds painting absorbing to the point that she loses track of time. Teaching, which requires a different kind of focus, is also rewarding for her. "I think it's a very special gift to be able to teach kids."

Esther Etigson, seen with one of her water colours, believes that fairness and consistency are important attributes for teachers. [Frances Kraft photo]

Cousins reunite in Australia after 61 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

After a 61-year separation, first cousins Brenda (née Babrow) Baskind, formerly of Johannesburg, who now lives in Toronto, and Michele (née Babrow) Levy of Cape Town came face to face.

"The last time Michele and I were together was in 1944 in South Africa where I was born and grew up. I was six months old and she was five years old," Baskind says.

"Our fathers were brothers and after my mother and father divorced in 1950, we lost touch with my father's family. My father died a short time later."

Baskind, her husband, Colin, and their three children, Alana, Stacey and Clif, came to Canada in 1987.

When Baskind's mother died in Johannesburg in 1999, her family went to South Africa for the funeral.

"While we were in Johannesburg for the funeral, I was surprised to get a phone call from my long-lost cousin Michele… She called to wish me long life and to express her condolences," Baskind says.

"Michele told me that she had heard about my mother's death from mutual friends and she decided to contact me after all those years."

Baskind says that although they did not meet at that time because of distance, they began to correspond.

Six years later, the Baskinds were invited to Levy's grandson's bar mitzvah, in Australia, where Levy's daughter and her family live.

Baskind, a nursery school teacher at Holy Blossom Temple, says, "I told them that we couldn't come to Australia in October because of my work. We were planning to visit Colin's sister in Perth, Australia, in December."

On Yom Kippur 2005, Baskind's sister-in-law died. "Our family went to Australia in October for the funeral and shivah. By coincidence, this sad occasion brought Michele and me together," Baskind says.

Although they hadn't met since 1944, Baskind says that after 61 years, they immediately felt a family connection. "We shared a great deal of information about my late father and his family because I knew very little about them."

She adds, "My cousin Michele has two sons living in the United States. Perhaps, when she comes to visit her children, we can make a time to get together."

First cousins Brenda (née Babrow) Baskind, left, and Michele (née Babrow) Levy, recently reunited in Australia after a 61-year separation.

Michele (née Babrow) Levy, 5, holds her first cousin Brenda (née Babrow) Baskind, who is six months old, in South Africa in 1944.

Mideast crisis divides French Jews, Muslims: author

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Despite the wave of social unrest and anti-Semitism that has recently gripped France, there is a future for French Jewry, says an award-winning author.

Erna Paris believes France's 600,000 to 700,000 Jews will continue to make decent lives for themselves, but their contentment will be rather ironically linked with the integration of Muslims, the primary perpetrators of recent anti-Semitic acts.

"The best hope for the Jews is the proper integration of Muslims," Paris told an audience of several hundred gathered recently at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"France [needs] a renewed pluralism that better tolerates diversity… and the Jews of France must be part of that process."

Paris, who studied in France and is a renowned writer on Jewish issues, attributed the strife between France's Muslim and Jewish communities to both historical factors and the ongoing crisis in the Middle East.

Historically, Jews and Arabs from North Africa immigrated in large numbers to France in the 1960s following the end of the war in Algeria," Paris said.

But unlike the North African Jews, the Muslims did not land in their new country as French citizens, she added.

"You have two communities moving to France from Algeria at the same time, but under inherently different circumstances."

Moreover, many native French were opposed to seeing the same people whom they fought in Algeria now living in France, Paris said.

"People on the right were unhappy to see their former enemies living with them."

Paris noted that discrimination against Muslims in France has contributed to the growth of urban ghettos and the resulting social turmoil, such as the riots that occurred mostly in the outskirts of Paris in late October and November.

Paris said that "what happens in Israel is usually mirrored in France," adding that strong support by French Jews and Muslims of their respective Israeli and Arab brethren has made relations between the communities precarious at times.

She cautioned against the trend among some Jews in France to have "hardened" attitudes toward Arabs and said relations will improve between the communities if both employ a "successful marginalization of radicals."

The situation is currently uneasy, and the riots illustrate the depths of the problem and should therefore prompt action, she said.

"The events may have opened a window to dialogue. Time is right for change."

During a question and answer session, an audience member alluded to the French government being anti-Israel.

Paris disagreed with that statement and said the French public isn't overtly anti-Israel either.

"Research demonstrates French leaders are not anti-Semitic… and in general, public opinion is not anti-Israel," she said.

While generally pleasant, some of the question and answer exchanges became heated.

One audience member labelled Paris a "typical peace-loving Canadian."

She took it as a compliment.

Protecting marriages and relationships

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

One of the most subtle and dangerous threats to shalom bayit is a person who pretends to be a friend but abounds with jealousy and envy. These are the kind of friends you must guard your home from.

So let's be bold and ask the daring question: Who is a true friend? Our sages foresaw such dangerous elements and taught us from Mishnah Avot, Ethics of the Fathers, where we find the following well-known remark: "Whenever love depends upon something and it passes, then the love passes away too. But if love does not depend upon some ulterior interest, then the love will never pass away. What is an example of the love which depended upon some material advantage? That of Amnon for Tamar. And what is an example of the love which did not depend upon some ulterior interest? That of David and Jonathan." (Ethics 5:19).

Friendships are forged from personal interests, but that does not mean that all interested "friendships" are false. For instance, when a friend is concerned about the welfare of a family member in a matter of sickness or tragic incident or any other difficulty, the key to determining the authenticity of this "interest" lies in the way a person conducts themselves.

Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsh writes, in his sefer Horeb: "Compassion is the warning voice of duty, which points out to you your brother in every sufferer, and your own sufferings in his, and awakens the love which tells you that you belong to him with all his sufferings with all the powers that you have. Do not suppress this compassion! If you do, it will no longer well up of itself, and you will have cut yourself off from the company of all your fellow creatures. You yourself will have destroyed the first proof of your mission as man and Israelite. Your heart becomes a stone and there no longer sounds in it the voice of God, reminding you of your mission."

So compassion is definitely a sign of sincere friendship. The same thought is expressed in the words of Mishle (Proverbs 17:17): "A friend loves at all times and becomes as a brother in adversity."

So what are the "friendly" threats to shalom bayit? An example of such a threat is a "friend" making derogatory statements about one's spouse or family, even in confidence, with the spirit of wanting to cause strife and dissension between a couple.

We are not describing someone who misunderstood a situation or witnessed an event that would warrant such a remark, such as in the case of an abusive wife or husband. We are talking of a person who envies the lot of another. Such a person will disgrace and degrade another in the presence of their own family or take a spouse aside and plant a seed intended to destroy her or his image of a family member.

There is a story of Rabbi Moshe Feinstein: A woman was once having an argument with her husband regarding a Shabbat halachic matter. As they were walking, they met with Rabbi Feinstein and some students. The woman proceeded to ask the rabbi to confirm if her interpretation was the correct one.

He responded that he had to verify that law and asked the couple to call him some other time. Rabbi Feinstein's students asked him why he did not answer such a simple question? He responded that it was wrong to humiliate the man in the presence of his wife. It would have violated a fundamental law in shalom bayit – that a positive image a husband and wife have of each other must always be protected from derogatory damage.

Rabbi David Cadoch is a chaver of HaGaon HaRav Leib Baron shlitah's Beth Din of Montreal and a member of the Rabbinical Council of America.

Chrismukkah? Bah humbug!

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

'Tis the season for Chrismukkah, which as any fan of the television series The OC will tell you, is a postmodern hybrid of Christmas and Chanukah – a celebration of both, and hence of neither.

There is a strange factuality to this merger of the holidays, in the sense it's a sociological commentary about the dilution of religion in both faith communities in the 21st century. Or in the words of one of The OC's characters, Seth, Chrismukkah is "eight days of presents followed by one day of many presents."

How do I, an inveterate non-TV-watcher, know all of this? From the source of much of my contemporary cultural education: my students. They urged me to watch the show's Chrismukkah episode a couple of years ago, and after some cajoling, I relented and was treated to a fairly depressing slice of current religious confusion, which was all the more saddening for being accurate in certain ways regarding how many Jews (fail to) understand and celebrate their Judaism.

The grand merger of the two holidays is always at a premium in what I call "overlap years," those calendrical coincidences when Chanukah and Christmas end up falling at the same time.

Matityahu and his white-bearded visage morphs into Saint Nick and egg nog washes down the sweet taste of sufganiyot. All of this bespeaks what some Israelis call "the Torah of galut," the massive assimilation/obliteration of authentic Jewish nationalism and Torah sensibilities by the forces, not of evil, but of the world simply doing what it does. Except for some of my Orthodox students, no one I teach sees anything wrong with the annual onslaught of Christmas movies and the ubiquitous renditions of Silent Night. The Miracle of Modin becomes transposed to 34th Street and nary an eyelash is batted at the shifting of geography and spiritual priorities that all of this entails.

Whence Chanukah? Well, there is the compensatory slew of presents, meant to somehow immunize Jewish children from feelings of being cheated by their gentile neighbours' Dec. 25 haul under the tree. And lighting the chanukiyah is a user-friendly mitzvah when combined with a round of latkes and dreidel playing. Lest I sound the like the grinch who stole Chanukah, I must say that I have nothing against any of these activities, and I will this year, as in years past, enjoy these Chanukah delights with my own children.

But the critical issue here is context. Chrismukkah, facetious or otherwise, repeats the myth of Chanukah as just another mom-and-pop retail holiday that's battling against – or combining with – the corporate empire of the Yuletide. As intermarriage skyrockets, Chrismukkah tells a story of religion that is no longer tailored around the will of God, but the comfort and sensitivities of blended families and multicultural mantras. But does this do justice to the true spirit of Chanukah?

The battle against the Seleucid Greeks was meant to preserve Jewish particularity. The Maccabees are not about beer and athletic events. They are about the ethical necessity of monotheism, the non-negotiability of mitzvah, and the distinctiveness of the Jewish people.

The loss of this message in the world of The OC makes it difficult to muster up even a lighthearted "Ho, ho, ho."

Jewish Life

Chanukah and the gift of reading

Books
Bernard Baskin

If you are considering Chanukah gifts, don't overlook books. The shelves of bookstores overflow with suitable volumes for every age, taste and preference.

The joys of reading are multiple and various. They are concerned with the great and inexhaustible pleasure of learning – about ourselves, about others, about the world around us.

Where we ourselves are concerned, books can furnish unexpected insights into our psyche and irradiate the dark places of the heart. Good books can help us find those hard to get at nooks and crannies of our own personality and can help us reach out.

About others, through historical fiction, biography, memoirs, letters and diaries, we have a window thrown open for us into the lives of persons living and dead – in all places and at all times. If we enter this world properly, we are able to say with Whitman, "I was there, I saw, I suffered."

Books also enable us to learn about our world. Here the choices are ample and unending. What does archeology teach us about the formation of the Bible? What are the latest findings in biology? What are the 613 mitzvot? Is Canada here to stay?

Once, when Benjamin Franklin was dining out in Paris, a friend posed the question: "What condition of man most deserves pity?" Each guest proposed an example. When it came Franklin's turn, he said, "A lonesome man on a rainy day who does not know how to read."

Love of books lasts when most other pleasures pass. It will support us when all other recreations are gone. Reading is to the mind what exercise is to the body.

Books are not just pages of lifeless paper, but minds alive on our shelves. Abraham Lincoln said, "The things I want to know are in books; my best friend is a man who'll get me a book I haven't read."

Just as the touch of a button on our television set will fill the room with music, or voices, so the opening of a book can call into range the voice of someone distant in time and place, allowing us to hear that person speak to us, mind to mind, heart to heart.

A new book is published in North American every 10 minutes. This startling statistic calls to mind the comment made by Emerson, "Whenever a new book comes out, I read an old one." This perceptive comment offers wise counsel – that some of life's greatest treasures are found in old books. They line the walls of our libraries, encouraging us to take them down and reread them.

Finally, there is one supreme consolation about books. The joys they offer are safe, as well as enduring. Many people have exercised themselves to death, many have played themselves to death, many have worried themselves to death – but no one has ever thought himself to death or died from the ecstasy of learning. Our body gradually dies, our emotions become dull, but the mind continues to live, and can grow ever more alive, volatile and encompassing.

For the love of latkes

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Chanukah is almost here. And to celebrate, it's time to pay tribute to the wonderful and tasty latke. Today, we're sampling the potato latke and its many oily variations on the World Wide Web.

When he appeared on Good Morning America, Rabbi Marc Gellman shared a classic latke recipe (potatoes, onions, eggs, oil) with a little twist: nutmeg. The rabbi also gave advice about the latke's faithful companion, apple sauce: "Core but do not peel about eight Mutsu or Rome apples. Cook with one-quarter cup of apple cider and cinnamon stick." [http://tinyurl.com/7zo2q]

If you ever tire of the traditional potato latke, don't despair. The Jewish Food LATKE archives have more than 100 varieties to tempt you, including Drunken Apple, Walnut, Cauliflower-Cheddar and Sephardic Bonuelos. [http://tinyurl.com/aw44r] Over at the RFCJ Recipe Archive, there are dozens more such as Chestnut Flour, Risotto and Norwegian Lox. But I think I'll pass on the Brain Latkes. [http://tinyurl.com/b25j4]

What to do if you love latkes but not the fat? The American Institute for Cancer Research suggests trying a no-oil Lean Latke. Coat a skillet with cooking spray and smooth the grated potatoes into a large, plate-sized pancake. One serving contains 162 calories and less than one gram of fat. And if a latke just isn't a latke without oil, then go ahead and splurge. Add one tablespoon. [http://cookwithaloha.com/latkes.htm]

Every year, amateur cook Roger Mummert holds court in his Long Island kitchen for chefs with the tastiest and most extreme latke recipes. Last year, the event was covered by National Public Radio, which archived its radio report along with recipes for winners, including Larry's Firecracker Latke Poppers, Spana-Latke-Kopita and Mexi-Latkes with Jalapenos and Red Peppers. [http://tinyurl.com/6rvvv]

There are many sites that give recipes, but I particularly like one that spends time on how to make a great latke. At the All Recipes site, there are tips about what kind of potatoes to use (russet), how to keep them from turning pinkish-brown (keep them under water) and how to make sure they don't fall apart when you're frying them (squeeze the potato mixture in a cheesecloth.) [http://tinyurl.com/329ku]

Who would have imagined that there's a whole sub-genre of latke humour lurking on the web? In the "Ritual Slaughter of the Latke," Raphael Finkel elucidates the intricate (and phony) Jewish laws that ensure that latkes are kosher. For example, just as kosher meat must be salted, Finkel says we must "remember to salt the potato and leave it to drain for at least 24 hours. We do this in memory of Lot's wife, Latke, who was turned to salt. Use a lotta salt, in memory of Lot's daughter, Lotta." [http://tinyurl.com/cjs3f]

Believe it or not, a scholarly book titled Desperately Seeking Certainty: The Misguided Quest for Constitutional Foundations has a recipe in it for potato latkes. Honest! The authors use that as a starting point to envisage how that recipe might be reinterpreted by leading jurists like U.S. Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia. "Scalia would conclude that latkes were a liberal distortion of the recipe as originally understood, so he would make matzah instead." [http://tinyurl.com/amy93]

Then there is the classic "Latke vs. Hamantash: A Materialist-Feminist Analysis." Robin Leidner, of the University of Pennsylvania's sociology department, tries to settle, once and for all, the age-old question: which food is more liberating for women – latkes or hamantashen? Let's just say that things don't come out to well for our favourite pancake. [http://tinyurl.com/8w84p] Meanwhile, the heavy thinkers at MIT engage in an annual food fight on the same weighty subject. [http://web.mit.edu/mgilbert/www/lhd/]

Speaking of weight, I'll leave the last word to writer Marjorie Ingall, whose wishes for a modern-day Chanukah miracle are probably shared by latke fans everywhere. [http://tinyurl.com/bvty5]

"My hope is that a miracle will occur and the calories of eight days will count as the calories of one."

Party leaders denounce comments

"We want to commend the Canadian government for speaking out and calling in the chargé d'affaires and being forceful in its opposition to what the Iranian president is saying," he said. "More than that, we want to commend the Canadian [party] leaders for standing up for Israel and against that kind of comment."

In Ottawa, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, the community's chief advocacy agency on Israel, said, "I'm happy [the party leaders] all reacted negatively to the comments and series of statements. I'm satisfied with the strength with which the prime minister conveyed his condemnation. I'm please he continues his understanding over the last months or so that there is a worrisome orientation in Iran to Jews and they are determined to pursue a nuclear program."

Fogel urged the Canadian government to "take a leadership role internationally to isolate Iran and Iran's leadership."

Turning to Harper's remarks, Fogel said he appreciates the Tory leader's condemnation of Ahmadinejad, but was "concerned over the absence of any linkage to [Iran's] nuclear threat and with the linkage he draws to the resolution of the Palestinian issue. Iran's hatred of Israel is a stand alone issue and not related to the Palestinian issue," he said. "The reality is, Iran is not motivated by any concern for Palestinians."

In Ottawa, Ronen Gil-Or, chargé d'affaires for the Embassy of Israel, said, "We are happy with the Canadian response and the prime minister's statement and the support he got from the head of the parties."

Gil-Or said Canada was one of the first countries to see the dangers presented by the head of a country with nuclear ambitions making such statements.

He said Israel supports the European Union's threat of imposing sanctions, "if Iran continues to bring messages of Holocaust denial to the world."

Iran's nuclear program "threatens the whole world, not just Israel," he added.

In a news release, B'nai Brith Canada urged the government of Canada "to use its influence to mobilize support for the convening of an emergency special session of the United Nations to discuss Iran's violations of UN principles and to consider international sanctions."

New JWI boss tackles domestic issues

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Lucy Alt, recently installed as national president of Jewish Women International for a two-year term, first joined the organization 43 years ago so she could go bowling.

"My friend's chapter – Don Mills – was starting a 10-pin bowling league, and to bowl, I had to join."

She quickly learned about the organization, however, and "felt at home right away. I got more and more involved and moved up through the ranks."

Among other positions, she has been on JWI's Toronto council and its national executive board. She has also been vice-president and president-elect, and she has worked on member leadership training.

Having worked at Bell Canada for 26 years – she retired nine years ago – Alt says that her corporate skills and the skills she learned from her volunteer work are transferable. "I did training sessions at work using skills I picked up through JWI."

Volunteering has always been part of her life. "I did at night what I now do during the day. I had a supportive husband before we knew what supportive husbands were.

"I got everything done because I learned to prioritize. Don't expend energy on things you have no control over. It doesn't get you anywhere. Work at things where you can make a difference."

Alt has taken on the JWI presidency at an exciting and challenging time, she says.

"We are becoming a one-issue organization. Our mandate is to raise funds and develop resources and programs concerning violence against women.

"It is a huge problem. Violence against women is in all arenas, and we have [made] it our responsibility to create a world that is safe."

Among other projects, JWI has put out a dating violence video aimed at teens and has distributed a brochure that has been translated into five languages – English, French, Russian, Hebrew, Spanish – with facts about domestic abuse and advice for women on how to protect themselves.

"We conducted a survey about domestic violence, and we were surprised to discover how many women could not recognize the signs," says Alt.

She says another challenge she faces is developing the organization so that it meets the needs of the community and modern women, she says.

"We realize that although the membership mode still exists, it is not universal. It is no longer attractive to everyone. We are trying to make [the group] more project-oriented.

Lucy Alt

"We've learned that many women want to become involved in short-term projects, because the thought of a long-term commitment scares them.

"We value our members tremendously, but we are offering another way to become involved.

"Volunteer organizations across North America are in the same boat. We have an aging membership, and to attract younger members we need a paradigm shift. It's painful to let go of things that worked so well, but we had to let go of a membership-based-only organization."

As a result, JWI is moving out of its "comfort zone," she said.

"We've determined that we will maintain and value our membership, but we will also have a place for supporters and donors. It makes for an interesting, effective organization.

"People have changed their way of volunteering, and we have to recognize that."

Finkelstein to join Jewish Agency

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada for almost seven years, will leave that position June 30 to become the Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI's) chief executive officer for North America.

She will be based in New York after taking on her new role next July.

The CEO position has been vacant for more than a year. David Sarnat, whose title was executive vice-president, last served an equivalent role.

Finkelstein, a native of Montreal who served as executive director of the Jewish Federation of Montreal (now Federation CJA) before moving to Toronto in 1999, said she will work closely with federations in both the United States and Canada to build relationships, represent JAFI's interests, and generate income for the quasi-governmental agency that deals with social service needs in Israel and overseas.

She will also be responsible for the hundreds of Israeli shlichim at North American schools, youth groups, aliyah offices and university campuses. This is a new aspect of the role she is taking on: previously the shlichim were the purview of an Israeli shaliach, she said last week in a phone interview from Vancouver, which she visited as part of a cross-country tour in her UIA role.

At UIA, she said, she has worked very closely with the Jewish Agency.

"It's an honour for me to be able to represent their interests and work on behalf of things that are so important historically," she said, referring partly to the agency's role in facilitating aliyah on a large scale from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia.

Among the things that appealed to Finkelstein about the new job, for which JAFI approached her, was the agency's involvement in Jewish identity and education initiatives, including Birthright Israel.

A UIAFC search committee has been struck to find a replacement for Finkelstein.

Shaare Zedek Foundation gets new executive director

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jerry Tollinsky was recently appointed national executive director of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

Tollinsky brings more than 20 years of entrepreneurial experience in Montreal and Toronto to the foundation. He says this is his first venture into the field of health-care support, but he sees very little difference between this new challenge and his previous work in educational fundraising. He was the director of development for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), a position that he created.

Working together at the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation offices in Toronto are Jerry Tollinsky, left, the organization's newly appointed executive director, and Jeff Rosenthal, newly elected president.

"At Shaare Zedek, I hear stories every day that underscore the warmth and love that emanates from the doctors and nurses as they administer life-saving medical treatment," he says.

"Shaare Zedek is known as the 'hospital with a heart,' and I am privileged to work closely with a young local leadership team that is committed to supporting this great place."

Tollinsky says Shaare Zedek faces enormous financial challenges "in order to maintain its standard of excellence and to continue to grow.

"Canadian families have been trusted supporters for more than 30 years, and I am excited to have the opportunity to participate in that great mission."

He adds that Shaare Zedek blends science and compassion, caring for everyone who requires care, "no matter what their race, religion or political affiliation."

Jeff Rosenthal, the newly elected national president of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, says Tollinsky brings "a wealth of knowledge to the position [of national executive director].

"It is my hope and belief that Jerry will help us move Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation to the next plateau."

Rosenthal says he is following in the footsteps of some very committed volunteers, leaders who have given freely of their time and ability in order to raise funding for Shaare Zedek.

"It is our mission to take the significant work that has been done by them to date and build on it. With Jerry as part of our team, we hope to increase the breadth and depth of our volunteer base, which in turn will result in incremental funds raised for the hospital."

Tollinsky was raised in Montreal and attended Sir George Williams University. He worked as a volunteer for community organizations in the city. In 1977, he moved to Toronto with his family and worked in sales and marketing. In 1997, he became involved in communal work here.

He served as national executive director of the Canadian office of Bar-Ilan University and he is a past president of the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT).

Tollinsky and his wife, Anne, have two children, a son, Martin, who lives with his wife and three children in New Jersey, and a daughter, Joelle, who lives in Jerusalem, having made aliyah in 2003.

New cookbook offers recipes to make with your kids

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Cooking with your kids is a great way to spend quality family time, says cookbook author Susie Fishbein.

"And sharing what you make together is even more fun," says Fishbein, who was at the recent Kosherfest 2005 in New York City.

Author of Kosher by Design, Kosher by Design Entertains and the newly published Kosher by Design, Kids in the Kitchen, Fishbein says that sometimes the "pickiest of eaters will eat something because they made it themselves.

"I've seen some kids gobble up something that they'd never eaten before. They just have to eat their own creations," says Fishbein, a self-taught cook who often cooks with her own four children.

Recipes in her new book are suitable for kids ages 10 and older, she says, and each one is coded with a chef's hat – one hat is an easy recipe that requires few cooking skills, and three hats are for those who are comfortable in the kitchen.

Each recipe also begins with an equipment list, and the beginning of the book features a full colour equipment chart with a clear picture of each item including everything from the simplest measuring cup, cutting board, measuring spoons, mixing bowls and wooden spoons, to the slightly more sophisticated immersion blender, tongs, pastry brushes, peppermill and sifter.

No instruction is left unexplained, she says. "In my alphabet soup recipe, I tell them to use their can opener to open a can of tomatoes. I don't want kids to look at the can and wonder how to open it."

She stresses, however, that although the recipes are easy for kids to make, they're also great for adults who "want to put together something quickly and easily. Who doesn't enjoy vegetable dumplings served with teriyaki sauce, steak fajitas or sweet potato pie?"

Not only is cooking fun, she says, it can also be a learning experience. Kids learn math through measurements, nutrition through food selection, and independence through increased skills.

"They also learn to be creative because I encourage them to put their own touches in a recipe – different spices or toppings."

Here are a selection of recipes from her newest book.

MEATBALLS 2 WAYS

Equipment list:
medium mixing bowl
latex glove or large Ziploc bag measuring cups and spoons
can opener
1-2 medium pots with lids mixing spoon

Ingredient list:
1 lb. ground beef
¼ cup flavoured dry breadcrumbs
1 tsp. onion powder
1 large egg

Red sauce:
1 16-oz. can of whole berry cranberry sauce
1 26-oz. jar of your favourite marinara sauce

Brown sauce:
¼ cup dark brown sugar
3 tbsp. all purpose flour
1¼ cups water
¼ cup white vinegar
3 tbsp. soy sauce

Place the ground beef into the mixing bowl. Add the breadcrumbs and onion powder. Crack the egg and add it to the bowl. Place the glove or Ziploc bag over your hand and mush the mixture with your hand until it is all combined.

To make the red sauce, use your can opener to open the can of cranberry sauce and open the jar of marinara sauce and empty both into a medium pot. Place over medium heat and cook for 5 minutes, stirring with a spoon every few minutes. Roll half of the meatball mixture into balls, the size of large marbles, and carefully add them to the pot. Set the heat as low as possible. Cover the pot and cook for 40 minutes.

To make the brown sauce, place the brown sugar, flour, water, vinegar and soy sauce into a medium pot. Mix to dissolve the flour. Place over medium heat and cook for 3 minutes, stirring with a spoon every few minutes. Roll the other half of the meatball mixture into balls, the size of large marbles, and carefully add them to the pot. Set the heat as low as possible. Cover the pot and cook for 40 minutes. Makes 8 servings.

ZESTY CHICKEN

Equipment list:
8-in. square baking dish
small mixing bowl
measuring cups and spoons
spoon

New cookbook offers recipes to make with your kids

Ingredient list:
5 pieces of chicken, with bone and skin – you can use the legs, thighs or the breast
1/4 cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. ketchup
2 tsp. dry onion soup mix

Preheat oven to 350. Wash and dry the chicken pieces and place them into the square baking dish. In a small mixing bowl, mix the mayonnaise, ketchup and onion soup mix. Stir with a spoon to combine.

Pour the dressing mixture over the chicken and spread it over each piece. Place the baking dish into the hot oven and bake, uncovered, for 1 hour or until the chicken is done. Makes 5 pieces.

EASY MEAT ROAST

Equipment list:
heavy baking pan cutting board sharp knife garlic press
measuring cups and spoons
small mixing bowl
aluminum foil

Ingredient list:
4 lbs. beef brisket
1 large onion
5 garlic cloves, minced
1/2 cup ketchup
1/2 cup chili sauce
3 tbsp. brown sugar

Preheat oven to 350.

Place the meat in a heavy baking pan that is just big enough to hold it. On your cutting board, with a sharp knife, slice the onion rings. Spread the onions over the meat. Place the cloves of garlic, one at a time, into your garlic press. Squeeze the press so that the minced garlic gets all over the meat.

Pour the ketchup, chili sauce and brown sugar into a small bowl. Stir to mix. Pour over the meat. Cover the pan with aluminum foil and place in the hot oven for 2 1/2 hours. When the meat is done, carefully remove it from the oven. When it is cool enough to handle, carefully slice it into thin slices. You can re-heat it in the sauce. Makes 8-10 servings.

SESAME BROCCOLI

Equipment list:
large pot with lid
measuring cups and spoons
wooden spoon or silicone spatula strainer

Ingredient list:
12-oz. broccoli florets
1 cup water
1 tbsp. roasted or toasted sesame oil
1/4 cup soy sauce
2 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. sesame seeds

Place the broccoli florets into a large pot. Add the water. Bring the water to a boil over medium heat. Cover the pot and let the broccoli steam for 7-8 minutes. Remove the lid. The broccoli should be bright green and softened. Mix the broccoli with a wooden spoon or silicone spatula.

Place a strainer in the sink and carefully drain any water out of the broccoli. Return the broccoli to the pot. Add the sesame oil, soy sauce, honey and sesame seeds. Mix to combine. Turn the heat to medium and cook for 3-4 minutes. Remove from the heat and serve. Makes 4-6 servings.

CHANUKAH Food Ideas

Treat your family to homemade cookies

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Cookies seem to be one of the foods that will make almost every adult recall fond childhood memories.

As a food person, I find it interesting when attending a simchah or kiddish to simply stand and watch what people choose to eat. Both adults and children usually pick the cookies or squares first. With the busy lives we lead today, however, most of us don't have the time, or don't make the time, to bake fresh cookies. They come out of a package or, at best, from the local bakery.

Cookies are not something that you can just put into the oven, set the timer and walk away until the bell rings. Perhaps this is why many of us don't take the time to make them, but your family will certainly appreciate your effort if you do.

You have to watch cookies and baby them a little. If they're not browning evenly, reverse the cookie sheet from back to front. If the bottoms are burning before the tops get done, place an extra cookie sheet underneath. Check your oven temperature – it may be too hot.

If you bake cookies immediately after mixing the dough, they will spread more than if the dough is chilled for a few hours.

When baking cookies on baking paper, you can shape the whole batch of dough, then slide the baking paper onto the cookie sheet, bake the cookies, then slide that batch off and the next one on. Let the cookie sheet cool for a few minutes, however. If you put the dough on a hot cookie sheet, the cookies will spread very thin. Be sure to have cooling racks handy or the bottoms will get soggy and the cookies will be limp instead of crisp.

Cookies should be completely cool before you store them in airtight containers. If you don't have enough airtight containers, use freezer bags and suck the extra air out of the bag. Cookies freeze beautifully.

Keep cookies soft by adding a piece of apple or bread to the container, and change it every day.

Store bar cookies in the pan they were baked in if possible, then cover them tightly with foil or plastic wrap. Meringues should be stored in tightly covered containers to keep them crisp. And don't bake them on a humid day – they'll get too soft.

The following recipe for basic cookie mix followed by several variations enables you to make a variety of cookies at one time without a lot of fuss.

BASIC COOKIE MIX WITH VARIATIONS

8 cups flour
4 cups packed brown sugar
1 tbsp. salt
1½ tsp. baking soda
1½ cups shortening

Mix flour, brown sugar, salt and soda. Cut in shortening until mixture resembles fine crumbs. Seal tightly in storage containers no longer than 10 weeks. Makes 15 to 16 cups cookie mix.

Toffee Bars
4 cups cookie mix
½ cup margarine, softened
1 egg
1 tsp. vanilla
1 bar (4 oz.) milk chocolate, broken into sections
½ cup chopped nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Mix cookie mix, margarine, egg and vanilla. Press into a greased, 9x13-inch baking pan. Bake in preheated oven for 25 to 30 minutes, until light brown. Remove from oven and immediately place chocolate pieces over soft crust. When soft, spread evenly. Sprinkle with nuts. Cut into bars while warm. Makes 4 dozen.

Spice-raisin cookies
4 cups cookie mix
1 cup raisins
⅓ cup molasses
1 egg
1 tsp. ground ginger
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. ground cloves
½ tsp. ground nutmeg
3 tbsp. water
vanilla butter frosting (recipe follows)

Mix cookie mix, raisins, molasses, egg, ginger, cinnamon, cloves and nutmeg. Stir in water. Drop by teaspoons onto ungreased cookie sheet. Bake in a preheated oven at 375 for about 9 minutes, until almost no indentation remains when touched. Immediately transfer to wire racks to cool. Frost. Makes 4 dozen.

Vanilla butter frosting
3 cups powdered sugar
¼ cup margarine, softened
1½ tsp. vanilla
2 tbsp. milk, water or orange juice

Cream together sugar, margarine and vanilla. Add enough liquid to produce a smooth, spreading consistency.

Chocolate bonbon cookies
4 cups cookie mix
¼ cup (4 tbsp.) margarine, softened
2 eggs
2 oz. melted unsweetened chocolate (cooled)
1 tsp. vanilla
½ tsp. almond extract
1 cup chopped nuts
powdered sugar frosting (recipe follows)
coconut, nuts or candied cherries for garnish

Mix cookie mix, margarine, eggs, chocolate, vanilla, almond extract and nuts. Shape into 1-inch balls. Place about 1 inch apart on ungreased cookie sheets. Bake in a preheated oven at 375 until set, 10 to 12 minutes. Cool slightly before removing from cookie sheets. Roll about 30 cookies in powdered sugar while warm; cool. Roll in sugar again. Frost remaining cookies and decorate with coconut, nuts or cherries. Makes 5 dozen.

Powdered sugar frosting
1 cup powdered sugar
½ tsp. almond extract
1 tbsp. milk, water or juice

Beat ingredients together until mixture reaches spreading consistency.

Sparkle cookies
4 cups cookie mix
⅓ cup softened margarine
2 eggs
1½ tsp. cream of tartar
½ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. almond extract
red and green granulated sugar

Combine all ingredients except coloured sugars and mix well. Shape dough by teaspoons into balls. Roll in sugar. Place 2 inches apart on ungreased cookie sheets. Bake in a preheated oven at 400 until light brown, 8 to 10 minutes. Immediately remove from cookie sheets; cool. Makes 4 dozen cookies.

Festival 'to present a different side of Israel'

By LAUREN BRESLIN
Special to The CJN

Breath mints inscribed with the words "Refresh your love of Israel" may well capture the flavour of IsraelFest 2006, where the mints will be distributed as part of a week-long celebration of Israeli arts and culture at four Toronto-area campuses.

The annual festival, scheduled for the week of Jan 23 to 29 at York University, University of Toronto, Ryerson University and Seneca College, and run by members of Hillel, is meant to present a positive image of the Jewish state.

"Some students only look at Israel through the [Arab-Israeli] conflict," said Orna Hollander, Hillel's Israel affairs co-ordinator at York. "The idea is for IsraelFest to present a different side of Israel – to show the campus what Israel is like beyond the conflict."

IsraelFest kicks off with a gala evening at the Miles Nadal JCC featuring Ethiopian-Israeli comedian Yossi Vassa – often dubbed "the Eddie Murphy of Israel" – who will perform in both English and Hebrew.

Throughout the week, organizers from participating campuses will host a varied slate of activities, including a workshop on religious pluralism in Israel, a panel discussion on young Zionist expression, an Israel social action fair and an Israeli café.

The York event will host a charity four-on-four basketball tournament to raise money for Israeli non-profit organizations, and U of T's campus radio station will be broadcasting Israeli music. Both campuses will also feature screenings of Israeli films.

"This is really a time for us to focus on Israel's unique, multicultural and diverse character from an arts and culture standpoint," Hollander said.

The organizers are aiming for a feel-good atmosphere of fun and learning, but past IsraelFests have had their share of strife.

Last year at U of T, for example, the Arab Students Collective scheduled another event to take place at the same time called Israel Apartheid Week, which condemned Israel as a racist state.

Yet despite what happened last year, Hillel organizers have chosen not to omit politics entirely from IsraelFest.

"We're not going to ignore the political culture that is part of what makes Israel a unique place," said Leemor Zalin, Hillel's Israel affairs co-ordinator at U of T and Ryerson.

"We don't want to say that Israel is just deserts and camels and falafels. Part of what makes Israel really special is the political culture there – the idea that there are more opinions than there are people."

To represent the diversity of political viewpoints in Israel, the U of T event will present a student-made movie produced specifically for IsraelFest.

"We have some students going to Israel and we're sending them with a video camera, and they're going to be putting together a film to show all of those different opinions."

IsraelFest will also promote the travel and study-abroad opportunities available in Israel.

Representatives from Hebrew University and Tel Aviv University, as well as birthright israel programs such as Canada Israel Experience, will take part in the Israel education program and a volunteer options fair.

"People will be able to walk around and see what their options are if they want to go to Israel," Zalin said.

Both Zalin and Hollander encourage students of all religious backgrounds and political viewpoints to take part in the week-long festivities.

"The whole point of IsraelFest is to engage the general public," Zalin said. "It's not for Hillel or for the Jewish community – it's for everyone."

Jury convicts Edmonton man in Internet hate case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Edmonton jury deliberated for slightly more than three hours last week before finding Reinhard Gustav Mueller guilty of promoting hatred of Jews on an Internet website.

The conviction is believed to be the first ever under the Criminal Code for using the Internet to promote hatred of an identifiable group.

Mueller, who also goes by the name Reni Sentana-Reis, now faces a maximum of two years in jail. Crown prosecutor Steven Bilodeau told reporters he will ask Judge Phil Clarke for a jail term for the 62-year-old Edmonton man.

Clarke turned down a Crown request that he order a psychiatric examination of Mueller, who acted on his own behalf and offered a bizarre explanation for his views.

Mueller, 62, testified that ancient writing declared him a spiritual leader called the Lion of the Tribe of Judah and that he has authority over the destiny of the Jewish people, the Edmonton Journal reported.

The Edmonton Sun reported that Mueller claims he is of ancient Egyptian descent and "has authority recognized by all high councils of this galaxy." In addition, Mueller has assumed the titles of Grand World Councillor, Lion of Judah, Starship Commander Dexter and Guardian of the Arab Prophetess Uthrania Seila.

A website, called Federation of Free Planets, which Mueller admitted operating from 1999 to 2003, described Jews as subhumans and demons. On the site, Mueller alleged the Holocaust was greatly exaggerated, that Jews were responsible for creating the Ebola and AIDS viruses, and that they had caused the destruction of the World Trade Center and were responsible for the Columbia space shuttle disaster.

He called on visitors to the website to rise up against an alleged Jewish conspiracy and isolate and neutralize Jews.

Mueller told the jury he is not a hatemonger, but an investigative reporter.

He called the conviction "a dark day for Canada."

Ironically, Mueller drew police attention to himself when he reported someone had left a box of Molotov cocktails in his front yard. He told police he was likely targeted because of his "politically incorrect" website. Police investigated the site and charges resulted.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "to the best of my knowledge, this is the first time there's been a successful conviction under [hate crime laws] for contents on an Internet website."

He said it was significant that an existing piece of legislation was applied to a new medium. "But there was never anything in Section 319 [of the Criminal Code regarding hate crimes] that would act as a bar to it applying to the Internet," he added.

Ottawa human rights lawyer Richard Warman said the charge and conviction of Mueller "just shows how on top of things the Edmonton [Police] hate crime unit is. They really have become the poster child of what a hate crimes unit can do."

Warman said a second Edmonton man, Glenn Bahr, has also been charged under the Criminal Code for material he allegedly posted on two websites.

Warman said Mueller's conviction may lead law enforcement officials in other jurisdictions to lay hate charges. "I hope it shows that just because the technology has changed, it doesn't mean the law has changed," he said.

Warman said he has asked police in London, Ont., to charge Tomasz Winnicki under the Criminal Code. Police have told him the matter is under investigation, but Warman has also laid a complaint to the Canadian Human Rights Commission regarding Internet postings allegedly made by the London white supremacist. "The postings engaged in profanity-laced attacks alleging Jews were murderers bent on destroying Western civilization and that blacks were animals, subhumans, criminals and should be segregated," Warman alleged.

Final arguments in that case were held on Dec. 12 and Warman expects a decision in the next few months.

סינית אני מדברת אליך

ראינו לפני שבועיים הצגה מרגשת בתיאטרון בית ליסין, שמבוססת על סיפור קצר של הסופרת סבינו ליברכט. סיפרה של ליברכט "סינית אני מדברת אליך", כמו גם ספריה האחרים, הציבו אותה בעשור האחרון במקום מרכזי של ספרות ישראלית עכשווית. היא גם ביקרה והרצתה בטורונטו מספר פעמים.

המחזה, שנכתב על ידי הסופרת עצמה ובויים על ידי עודד קוטלר, מספר את סיפורה האופייני של משפחת ניצולי שואה, אי היכולת של האם להתאושש ולהיות חיובית ולו רק לרגע אחד, והאֶפֶקט המצטבר על ביתה היחידה שבורחת מהבית אחרי מותו הטרגי של האב, שהיה הדמות השפויה היחידה בסביבה.

עד כאן-קו עלילה די צפוי שהטיפול בו די שגרתי. אך יש במחזה מפגש רב עוצמה בין הילדה לבין השכן בן עדות המזרח, שמשפחת הילדה תמיד הסתכלה עליו כיצור נחות, והוא, מסתבר, עשה עבורם הרבה יותר ממה שהם היו עושים אי פעם עבורו. מאחר ואינני רוצה להרוג לכם את קו העלילה (כי זה מחזה שאתם חייבים לעצמכם) אסתפק בזה.

אין מה להגיד-תיאטרון חכם עם שחקנים מצויינים (שרון אלכסנדר, טלי רובין, קרן צור, חגית בן-עמי). ממש נחת. צריך לקוות שיגיע הנה-אך קל למצוא כרטיסים אפילו לאותו יום בתל אביב. תשע בסולם קורן.

אלימות-יונ'ין נכט

קשה לחשוב על נושא יותר חשוב בישראל מאשר האלימות הגואה. אלימות מילולית בכנסת, אלימות ברחוב, אלימות של נער בבתי ספר. ועל כן מרענן לראות שאמן ישראלי יליד רומניה (אביו היה מוסיקאי ידוע שָם ויש רחוב על שמו בבוקרסט) תוקף את הבעייה הזאת ברמה אמנותית וטיפולית.

הסטודיו למשחק של יונ'ין נכט מעלה בימים אלה הצגה על אלימות בהשתתפות "כיתות האומן" של הסטודיו.

וכך מציג יונ'ין עצמו את הפתרון המקורי שלו:

"במציאות הקשה בה אנו חיים, גל האלימות בקרב הנוער גובר מיום ליום. החלטתי להכין, ביחד עם כיתות האומן של הסטודיו, הצגה בנושא אלימות.

תקותי היא שבמקום שבו המילים כבר איבדו את כוחן להשפיע, ההצגה תצליח לחדור ללב האדם.

ההצגה מוקדשת לעשרות הקורבנות ולאלה שעדיין מאמינים שאפשר לעצור את כדור השלג ומוכנים לעשות זאת". יישר כוח, יונ'ין.

חקלאות בישראל 2005

אני פוגש את בן עמי מלמד, שכן של הורַי, בן שמונים. הוא מספר לי שהוא עדיין יוצא כל בוקר עם שחר לעבֹד את הפרדס שלו. אבל זה רק בשביל הכיף. את רוב הפרדסים עקרו כי מחיר המים עלה פי עשרה, והחוצאות עולות על מחיר תפוז יפו המפורסם.

אני פוגש את נדה, בת משפחה מושבניקית בת שמונים. אני שואל איך החקלאות, והיא מביטה בי בתימהון: "אין חקלאות, שום כלום. אי אפשר לחיות מזה".

וכדי לתת לי דוגמא מוחשית היא מספרת:

"לפני עשרים וחמש שנה, כשגידלנו אבוזים, אני זוכרת ששק אגוזי פָקאן שילם לנו חופשה של שבוע בנהריה. היום שק פָקאן הוא אולי כרטיס רכבת לחיפה". עצוב, אבל שישאר בינינו.

מודעות פרסומת

בכל העולם-מודעות פרסומת הן שיא ההגזמה המגוכחת של החיים. בתור מי שנסע הרבה - יד על הלב-בישראל מפלס ההגזמה שם את כל העולם בכיס. הינה דוגמא קטנה לסיום: "קָנה וילָה בקַרפר, הפרובאנס של ישראל".

מי שהיה בפרובאנס-מודעה כואבת תעשה לו חֶרֶה והוא לא יתקרב לכרכור. אבל כמובן למי שלא היה-"פרובאנס" מצלצל צרפתי, וזה טוב לעסקים. כמו הקומיקאית שאומרת שאם אתה רוצה למכור בושם-תן לו שם בצרפתית. אפילו צואת תרנגולת מצלצלת טוב כשאומרים במבטא צרפתי "קָקה דָה פּוּלָה". אבל שישאר בינינו.

Israel's image has improved, but remains fragile

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The National Post editorial "A small victory for Israel" (Dec. 10) argued that "an important shift is under way in world opinion" about Israel. As proof, it cited recent pro-Israel moves at the United Nations, including Canada's votes against several anti-Israel resolutions.

The Post also noted that Israel's Magen David Adom is finally being allowed to join the International Committee for the Red Cross, following decades of stonewalling by a large bloc of Muslim and other countries. (See "From the editor's desk" CJN, Dec.15, for details.)

The international community has also started to view Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a new light after his successful withdrawal of settlers and soldiers from Gaza and parts of the West Bank this past August. The following month, he was warmly received at the United Nations General Assembly, where he delivered a speech that stressed Israel's desire to achieve peace, and reinforced his status as a statesman.

"I [must] emphasize the immensity of the pain I feel in my heart at the recognition that we have to make concessions for the sake of peace between us and our Palestinian neighbours," Sharon said. "The right of the Jewish people to the Land of Israel does not mean disregarding the rights of others in the land. The Palestinians will always be our neighbours. We respect them and have no aspirations to rule over them. They are also entitled to a national, sovereign existence in a state of their own."

Sharon's star rose even further last month when he shocked the world by abandoning the right-wing Likud party to form the new, centrist Kadima party to contest the upcoming Israeli elections.

Meanwhile, other events in the Middle East are improving Israel's position by taking the spotlight off its conflict with the Palestinians. These include:

- The national elections in Iraq and the prospect for democracy in the region.
- The ongoing UN investigation into Syria's role in last February's assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, and the suspicion that Syria was involved in the Dec. 12 assassination of Gibran Tueni, a prominent anti-Syrian journalist and parliamentarian.
- Recent terror acts in Arab countries, including Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan.
- Iran's continued threats against Israel, most notably President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and his denial of the Holocaust. His genocidal rants have only raised the alarm that the Iranian regime, in the grip of a clique of like-minded fanatics that is racing to acquire nuclear weapons, is a major threat to international peace. Consequently, sympathy for Israel, especially in the West, has welled up in a way that would have been unimaginable even a year ago.

But while Israel's image has improved, it remains fragile. It may be that international expectations will always remain unfairly high. For example, in the wake of the withdrawal from Gaza and the West Bank areas, many now expect Israel to leave the rest of the West Bank after elections in March.

Similarly, Israel has been faulted for not sufficiently supporting Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas. But many Israelis fear that Abbas' "weakness" in not controlling the various Palestinian factions is a strategic move to keep Israel without a viable peace partner.

It's not only people on the right who are making this claim. Most Israelis, including those on the centre-left, feel this way.

As Barry Rubin wrote in the Globe and Mail ("And the big loser is... Mahmoud Abbas," Dec. 8): "The fact that the Palestinian national movement is collapsing and its leaders are paralyzed is the single most important fact dooming any hope of Middle East peace for years to come."

Abbas' Fatah party is dealing with violent competition for power from its own young guard, and it continues to face an ongoing challenge from the increasingly popular Hamas. Meanwhile, Israel must continue to try to thwart terror attacks by Islamic Jihad and groups such as the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, a faction of Fatah, although this at times requires resorting to raids, arrests, roadblocks, and in some cases, targeted killings.

Analysts warn that the PA may use Israel's actions as a convenient excuse to put off elections, thus trying to lay responsibility for any postponement at Israel's door.

Hamilton UJA campaign rebounds from slow start

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Organizers say Hamilton's UJA campaign is back on track after a delayed launch and a leaky roof at the city's JCC building got it off to slow start.

The launch of the 2006 campaign – which aims to raise a record $1.1 million, a 10 per cent increase over 2005's record-setting $1-million haul – was delayed intentionally so as not to conflict with a mid-September fundraiser by Shalom Village, the city's Jewish seniors complex, said Gerald Fisher, executive director of UJA Federation of Hamilton.

The unusually late High Holy Day season also hampered this year's campaign, whose proceeds support local needs and those in Israel and elsewhere abroad, Fisher said.

Yet, despite initial problems, organizers say things are picking up.

"Currently, commitments for 2006 are actually equivalent to those at the same point in the campaign last year," said campaign chair Larry Levin.

Canvassers have had good responses, and the number of donors who have increased their donations over last year is heartening, he said.

"It speaks to the level of support of our wonderful Jewish community. The beneficiary agencies are counting on us, whether our office is functional or not, and we won't let them down."

The worst problem the campaign has had this year, Fisher said, has been water damage to the JCC building, which houses the offices of UJA Federation of Hamilton, as well as office machinery and records that are essential to the campaign.

After water leaked into the building during the summer, many federation staffers opted to work at home due to concerns that dampness and mould would affect their health, and most campaign meetings have been held at Temple Anshe Shalom.

An engineering consulting firm was hired to assess the damage to the JCC, and the necessary work on the roof and other water-damaged areas has either been completed or is under way. The firm also did air quality tests and declared the facility safe.

"But still, that's not much help to those loyal and valued staff members who have respiratory or allergy problems and still believe their health is being imperiled by working in the building," Fisher said.

With snowbirds beginning to head south and the deadline to make tax-receiptable donations for 2005 drawing closer, the campaign's difficult start was even more worrisome, he added.

But donors have come through. "One of the very nice things about the Hamilton Jewish community is the good strong core of people who have given to the UJA all their lives and continue to give," Fisher said.

He noted that the changing face of Hamilton Jewry has meant campaign organizers have had to work hard to broaden the campaign's donor base, as families that once contributed a disproportionate chunk of UJA receipts or bailed out earlier drives have left.

"The guys who you could go to 10 or 15 years ago and say, 'We're in trouble, could you dig a little deeper?' they're long gone," he said. "Besides, that's no way to organize and provide leadership to the community."

Over the past few years, the UJA donor base has been significantly expanded through community analysis and amateur detective work. As a result, the campaign has become broader and more inclusive, Fisher said.

Leaky roof spurs debate on future of Jewish Community Centre

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — A leaky roof at Hamilton's JCC that has led to expensive repairs and the relocation of programs has raised questions about the aging building's future as it faces more repairs and longstanding complaints about its location.

The leaks, which occurred after August's heavy rains, necessitated repairs to the northern and western parts of the roof. They were completed in September under the direction of consulting engineers Trow Associates, and no leaks have been reported since, according to a JCC statement on UJA Federation of Hamilton's website.

Mould was also found in three interior areas, and as a result, an arts and crafts room, a children's playroom and the centre's two squash courts were closed.

Since the repairs, Trow Associates has assessed the facility for air quality and the presence of mould and declared it safe for use, the JCC statement said.

The repairs cost about $45,000, said developer Larry Szpirglas, who has been acting as a consultant to the JCC.

In the meantime, the JCC relocated most of its programs off site as a precaution while addressed lingering doubts about health and safety in the building, Szpirglas said.

Sunday programs for children and adults were moved to Adas Israel Synagogue, and Camp Kadimah, a children's winter camp, was moved to the Yeshiva of Hamilton boys high school.

Summer rain caused $45,000 in damage to Hamilton's JCC.

Some employees of UJA Federation of Hamilton, which is housed in the JCC building, also decided to work off site out of concern about health issues.

It's not the first time the roof has failed – a similar situation occurred three years ago – and the facility, which was originally a private racquet club, is more than 30 years old.

The latest leaks have intensified a debate about the JCC's location that has split the community since the JCC bought the building in 1987, said federation executive director Gerald Fisher.

At the time, Hamilton's Jewish community had already shifted westward, and the existing JCC building in the east-central part of the city was no longer conveniently situated.

The present building, although closer to the population it's meant to serve, is located at the base of the Niagara Escarpment in the Ancaster area of Hamilton on a road about a kilometre from the nearest bus line, and Fisher said he often gives lifts to children and seniors he sees walking to the centre.

Indeed, Jewish Social Services, (JSS) the multi-service agency that does family counselling and provides relief for needy families, is moving out of the building, because of its location.

"It's not just because of the problems with water and mould," said agency president Susan Roth. "We can offer better service to our clients by being in a location that is closer and more accessible."

In its favour, the building has good racquet-sports facilities – nine indoor and outdoor tennis courts and two regulation squash courts – and sits near an urban conservation area on a large parcel of scenic land that's used for youth camps, a growing part of the JCC's programs.

Szpirglas said urgent decisions need to be made about the facility's future, because significant investments are required to eventually replace the cedar facing on the outside of the building and pay for needed mechanical improvements.

"The [original] campaign to raise money to purchase the property fell short, leaving the JCC with a significant bank mortgage," said federation president Leslie Lasky.

"The campaign did not provide any resources for maintenance and capital replacement, leaving the JCC with the need to take 'creative shortcuts' in building repair and maintenance, staffing and operations," he added.

He said the community needs to consider a number of questions: Should the building be repaired? Should it be torn down and rebuilt on the present site? Should the property be sold and the JCC relocated to a more convenient location? Or should Hamilton be thinking about a "virtual centre" without walls that uses other buildings such as shuls and schools for existing JCC programs?

"The issue isn't just about repairing a leaky roof," Lasky said in a column in the Hamilton Jewish News. "It's about providing a facility and a program that the community truly wants, uses and can afford. It's about having a centre that attracts a larger Jewish membership, that reaches out to enhance a sense of community and Jewish identity."

He said that over the next few months, the federation will seek input from all stakeholders, including JCC members, users, donors and young families.

Fisher said the process will start in January and "take several months, but we should have resolution by Pesach, ready for the allocation process in the spring."

Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT), one of the largest Orthodox synagogues in North America, invites applications for the position of

Assistant Rabbi

This new position (commencing in the summer of 2006) is being created as a result of our continuing growth in membership and our expanding adult and youth programs, shiurim and study groups.

The Assistant Rabbi will work under the day-to-day direction of our Moreh D'Asra, Rabbi Baruch Taub. Vancouver suburb allows chanukiyah at city hall

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The city council of Richmond, B.C., has voted to change its policy regarding the display of religious symbols at City Hall, allowing a chanukiyah to be lit their during the eight days of Chanukah.

Richmond Mayor Malcolm Brodie said the city's old policy allowed religious symbols to be displayed at the city's library and cultural centre, which is close to, but separate from, City Hall.

He said few, if any, religious symbols were ever displayed at the city's cultural centre, however.

The mayor said he welcomed the policy change, because the old policy was "outdated," adding that, by and large, the change has been applauded by Richmond residents.

"When the new City Hall was built in 2000, the intention was that it be a central meeting place for all the people of Richmond," he said. "Richmond has a very diverse population, and all of our residents need to feel respected and included."

Indeed, City Hall has not been without symbolic representations of the holiday season.

Since 2000, it has hosted a month-long Winter Wonderland in December that features a display of 32 Christmas trees sponsored by Richmond merchants.

The City Hall chanukiyah is being provided by Chabad Lubavitch of Richmond, which pushed for last month's policy change.

Chabad's Rabbi Yechiel Baitelman said that his group "wrote to City Hall several times over the past few years. The last letter [requesting to set up a chanukiyah] was sent in October 2004."

Every Chanukah, the Lubavitch movement holds public candlelighting ceremonies in cities across Canada and around the world, including one outside the downtown Vancouver Art Gallery.

"This has been done at the urging of the [late Lubavitcher] Rebbe [Menachem Mendel Schneerson] in order to fulfill the obligation of Chanukah of pirsumei nisa, the publicizing of the miracle of Chanukah and the message it carries," Rabbi Baitelman said.

"Richmond City Hall is a public place, where every citizen of the city is represented and 'owns' a part of it as well," he said.

"What better place to publicize the message of Chanukah, a message that is not limited to Jewish people, but in fact applies to all. The Chanukah menorah has a universal message – the power of one little candle to light up the whole world."

Located south of Vancouver across the Fraser River, Richmond is home to 170,000 people, including 4,000 to 5,000 Jews, or roughly 20 per cent of Greater Vancouver's Jewish community.

Ottawa teen wins book review contest

By TANIA HAAS
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — An Ottawa teenager has won a coveted position on a book review panel for Indigo Books & Music, Canada's largest book retailer.

Adam Moscoe, 14, beat out thousands of entrants from across the country to sit on Indigo's junior advisory board for a year. Moscoe will join four other teenagers from Halifax, Toronto, Vancouver and Victoria as a "Junior Booklover," a position that requires him to recommend books and write reviews before the books hit the shelves.

Adam Moscoe

"I pretty much represent teen readers in Canada," Moscoe said. "I receive advanced copies of books, read and review the titles. Since publishers are biased in their reviews, Indigo needs objective opinions – and that's what I provide."

The winners also receive prizes, including a $1,000 gift card from Indigo, a trip for two to Toronto, and an Apple iPod. Moscoe also donated $500 from Indigo's Love of Reading Fund to the library at the Ottawa School of Speech and Drama, which has about 400 students in after-school, evening, weekends and pre-professional programs.

Amanda Lewis, the school's artistic director, said the money will be used to buy materials for its library, such as monologues, scenes and information about teaching methods.

Moscoe's mother Margie is also enjoying her son's recent celebrity.

"Around Rosh Hashanah, we were told that he was one of 10 finalists," she said. "All the contest winners were invited to Toronto, and our whole family made the trip. He was on [CityTV's] Breakfast Television, the Ottawa Citizen interviewed him and he toured [Indigo's] Eaton Centre store with [CEO] Heather Reisman."

Moscoe recently spent a weekend working at an Ottawa Chapters and assisted shoppers with their book choices, especially for the teenagers on their holiday gift lists.

Former French prime minister reassures Quebec Jews

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Former French prime minister Alain Juppé is anxious to reassure the Jewish community of Quebec.

Prime Minister Jacques Chirac, a close colleague of Juppé's for many years, the French government and all the public institutions in France are leading the move to vigorously fight anti-Semitism there, Juppé said.

Juppé met with leaders of the Montreal Jewish community recently when he and his wife were here.

A series of articles that appeared in the National Post shortly before Juppé's visit to Canada, titled France's Jewish Exodus, surprised him with their clearly alarmist tone, he said.

"Not a single line in those articles mentions the important measures taken in recent years by the French government to combat anti-Semitism."

It is undeniable that there is and always has been anti-Semitism in France, he added. But this harmful scourge has also reappeared with force in other democratic countries. To corroborate that statement, he cited some statistics taken from surveys conducted by the Anti-Defamation League. In 2002-2003, anti-Semitic acts increased by 17 per cent in the United States. In 2004, anti-Semitic incidents rose by 42 per cent in Great Britain.

"I don't want to deny or minimize this serious phenomenon. I just want to say that France is not resigned to anti-Semitism. We are fighting it with as much energy as possible, and it would appear that we are seeing some positive results. When you say France is not doing anything to combat anti-Semitism, or that it is ignoring or minimizing it, it's not true. We are combating it very strongly, although I can't say we have been 100 per cent successful."

Juppé is very aware of the tension that has been felt in recent years in the Jewish community in France.

"I understand perfectly the anxiety felt by the French Jewish community. I know that for some time, there has been an increase in the number of applications for immigration to Canada, the United States and Israel… For France, it has become a major challenge. We are determined to combat the morbid phenomenon that is anti-Semitism. With the exception of the extreme right and the extreme left, which, in the name of solidarity with the Palestinians, plays down anti-Semitic acts, most political groups in France are involved in this crucial fight for the future of our country."

Juppé maintains that Chirac and the French governments of the last few years have proven their unwavering resolve to curb anti-Semitism. One proof is the draconian policy of zero tolerance that they intentionally established.

"And let's not forget the very strong public declaration Chirac made on Nov. 17, 2003: 'Any attack against a French Jew is an attack against the state,'" Juppé recalled.

France was not satisfied with making placating statements, Juppé said. It acted at three levels.

• It strengthened the legislation aimed at combating and severely punishing anti-Semitic acts. Since 2003, much stronger penalties have been imposed on those who perform racist, anti-Semitic or xenophobic acts. Since 2004, special prosecutors have been appointed to treat racist or anti-Semitic cases. In every court of appeal, there is now a referent magistrate who specializes in prosecuting anti-Semitic acts.

In July 2004, the French Parliament adopted a law increasing the penalties for racist and anti-Semitic acts in the media. As a result of that law, the anti-Semitic television station Al Manar, which broadcasts from Lebanon, was banned in France. In November 2003, a special law created an interministerial committee, chaired by the prime minister, to fight racism and anti-Semitism.

• Steps were also taken at the educational level. Today, there are specialized teams in all schools responsible for identifying and combating anti-Semitic incidents. A government pamphlet describing the pernicious ravages of anti-Semitism and racism is distributed in all schools in France.

• The third part of the major policy aimed at fighting anti-Semitism is a close co-operation with the European Union, the European Council, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe and the United Nations, to become involved with international activities designed to stamp out anti-Semitism.

Juppé said the Jewish institutions, including the CRIF – the umbrella political institution for French Jewry – are working closely with the government. There has been constant dialogue between the Jewish community and the French governing bodies. "They are working hand in hand at both the national and the municipal levels. As a former mayor of Bordeaux, I can state this with certainty."

He said the French government's policy of fighting anti-Semitism is beginning to show clear results: from January to the end of September 2005, anti-Semitic acts in France decreased by 50 per cent.

"You know that in the preceding few years, anti-Semitic acts increased by 100 per cent. It seems that the trend has been reversed. Even Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon acknowledged this when he was in France in July.

"At that time, Sharon said, 'In the fight against anti-Semitism, France is an example for the other European countries to follow.' You don't hear statements of that kind from Sharon very often. He had said the opposite just a few months earlier."

Azrieli launches project to publish survivors' memoirs

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – One of Canada's leading industrialists is putting his considerable resources at the disposal of his fellow Holocaust survivors living in this country to enable them to publish and distribute their memoirs.

"It's five minutes to midnight," said David Azrieli, underlining the sense of urgency of this project, as aging survivors and their memories pass away. His aim is to make it possible for any survivor to have their previously unpublished manuscript printed in high-quality book form and disseminated to research institutions, museums or libraries.

This is a joint project of the Azrieli Foundation, based in Toronto, and Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies, who will be the co-publishers. Upward of 50 softcover copies of each manuscript will be published at no charge, with the author getting five copies, and the rest going to institutions in Canada, the United States, Israel, and possibly elsewhere. The author will retain the copyright.

"We believe it is critical to preserve important historical records," the foundation's executive director Naomi Azrieli said.

The project is looking for written memoirs or diaries about events the author lived through before, during and/or after World War II. Submissions will also be accepted from the descendants of deceased authors.

They can be in any language (the foundation will have them translated in English), typed or handwritten, in hard copy or electronic. They can be any length sufficient to print as a book. Shorter material may be anthologized. Inclusion of photos and other images will be considered.

For now, the program is not accepting oral or videotaped testimonies.

Manuscripts will be vetted by an editorial board composed of Norman Ravvin, director of the Concordia institute, and retired English professor Mervin Butovsky and history professor Kurt Jonassohn. The selection process, however, will not be rigorous and manuscripts will only be lightly edited for grammar and obvious factual errors.

Several years ago, Butovsky and Jonassohn, with a modest grant from the CRB Foundation and Concordia's imprimatur, undertook a similar project, limited to Montreal. They gathered 57 memoirs, which were photocopied and bound in small runs. Distribution has been primarily via posting on the website of the Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies, with which Jonassohn is affiliated.

"We are sure there are a good number of other survivors in Canada who have written memoirs, which they could not find a commercial publisher to accept or who cannot afford to self-publish. There may be others out there who until now had not thought of publishing their memories," said Naomi Azrieli.

The fear is that these stories are being lost as survivors pass away. She would love to see these memoirs get into public libraries or schools across Canada to find a new audience besides Holocaust and Jewish studies researchers.

Eventually, the project hopes to have a website where the memoirs could also be published.

On the point of authenticity, Ravvin said that the project partners cannot take responsibility for the accuracy of what authors write, although with the new resources more fact-checking may be possible.

"We will not be acting as scholarly editors, nor are we going to attempt to dress up the authors' prose. We are not trying to make the authors into literary stars. The important thing is to let their voice come though," he said.

No significant changes will be made without the author's approval.

Once manuscripts are past the editorial board, Tamara Feder, the Azrieli Foundation's program director, has most of the responsibility for getting them ready for publication.

The institute may also hold public events related to the project, such as readings by the survivors of their memoirs, Ravvin said.

"Concordia is pleased, after the last few difficult years, to be able to remind the community that it has an active Jewish studies program," he added.

The project may republish some of the earlier works collected, probably as an anthology because most are about 30 to 40 pages in length.

"In the period after the war, many survivors did not want to talk about their experiences," said David Azrieli. "But often they sat down and wrote something, just for themselves. Now manuscripts from the early '50s are turning up, sometimes discovered by their children. There is a desire to have the world know what happened to the people before it is too late."

Azrieli, 83, published his own memoir One Step Ahead, written by another daughter, Danna Azrieli, in 1999. It was republished by Yad Vashem four years ago. He escaped Poland, and undertook a danger trek through the Soviet Union and into Iraq, eventually arriving in 1942 in Palestine. His parents, a brother and a sister perished in the Holocaust.

Azrieli immigrated to Canada in 1954, and became a prominent real-estate developer in Canada and the United States, and later in Israel, where he built the country's first enclosed shopping mall. His most recent major project is the Azrieli Centre in Tel Aviv, the tallest building in Israel and the largest commercial complex in the Middle East.

"My father got a sense of just how difficult it is to get published. He had a daughter to help him and all the resources in the world, yet it still took years," Naomi said.

David Azrieli has a long association with Concordia, where he established a Holocaust collection housed in the main library, which today comprises more than 5,000 volumes. For more information, call 416-322-5928 or e-mail memoirs@azrielifoundation.org.

Hamilton educator becomes cantorial soloist

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Laura Wolfson, an educator for the past eight years at Temple Anshe Sholom here, has now taken on the additional role of cantorial soloist.

She takes over the position from Lindi Rivers, who has moved to Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

As cantorial soloist, she will preside over the High Holy Days, bar and bat mitzvahs, Shabbat services and all the festivals, as well as at funerals.

The first time she sang officially as cantorial soloist was at a bat mitzvah in November.

"Some cantorial soloists are more like performers that you listen to and don't sing along with. Others are more invitational… they want people to sing along with them and consequently choose melodies that you can sing along with. That's the kind of cantorial soloist that I want to be."

Wolfson has an undergraduate degree from the University of Toronto in psychology and women's studies, and a master's degree in social work from Wilfrid Laurier University.

Before working in Hamilton she was a geriatric social worker in Kitchener-Waterloo; and a religious school teacher, youth group adviser, temple president and religious school principal for a number of years at Temple Shalom, Kitchener-Waterloo's reform synagogue.

She taught Hebrew at both Beth Jacob Synagogue in Kitchener-Waterloo and Beth Isaiah in Guelph.

Although she went to religious school and attended Holy Blossom services on the High Holy Days while growing up in Toronto, she says she was raised in a fairly secular home.

A trip to Israel when she was 15 stirred her interest in the Jewish world, the Jewish Diaspora and Jewish history, she said.

When she returned to Canada, she continued to study Hebrew and became active in her youth group. She also received a bursary from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which made it possible for her to learn Jewish leadership skills.

This bursary paid for her master's tuition, and in return, she made a commitment to contribute her skills to the Jewish community.

She has also become more personally involved in Judaism. "Even though I didn't grow up in a kosher home, I keep kosher now [and attend synagogue]."

Laura Wolfson

She became more drawn into Judaism while living in Kitchener. "In Toronto you can be Jewish by osmosis; you can be Jewish because you live in a neighbourhood where there are a lot of other Jews… In Kitchener where there is such a minority, I realized there is much more of a need to affiliate, so if you want Jewishness in your life, you have to go to synagogue and become more involved."

Music has always been a big part of her life, she says. She loves to sing and has participated in many choirs over the years. She was a lay service leader in Kitchener-Waterloo and uses music a lot in her teaching.

She started basic vocal training two months ago for her position as cantorial soloist. "I learned how to chant Torah and Haftarah for my bat mitzvah and I never forgot it. I've also attended synagogue every Shabbat since my early 20s, so I know five melodies for every prayer."

"I want to feel the music and I want to convey the emotion of the prayer," Wolfson says. "I try to sincerely feel the prayers and know what I am singing."

In the spring, she will be studying with a cantor in Toronto, where she will learn some specific High Holy Day melodies. The Union for Reform Judaism also offers intensive one-week training programs for cantorial soloists in Cincinnati or New York during the summer months, which she plans to attend.

Menorah to glow atop Tremblant

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – For the third consecutive year, a seven-foot Chanukah menorah will sit atop Mont Tremblant, one of the most popular ski resorts in the country.

On Dec. 25, everyone will be be given potato latkes as the first Chanukah candle is kindled at a public ceremony at 3:30 p.m.

The non-Jewish public reaction to the menorah has been very positive, said David Lyons, a developer at Tremblant who played an instrumental role in getting the resort to have a Chanukah menorah, in the spirit of seasonal holidays.

Lyons also approached the resort in his capacity as member of the House of Israel Congregation in Ste. Agathe, a 40- minute drive to the south.

The congregation's spiritual leader, Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach, will preside over the ceremony.

Mont Tremblant has had a Chanukah menorah for at least a decade, Lyons said, but it was usually placed in a less visible area or on land that eventually became the site of one of the resort's many condominium developments.

At that point, "I and Rabbi Carlebach approached the Mont Tremblant Resort Association, and they readily agreed to have a proper menorah in a very prominent place. It was a very nice thing for them to do and they were happy to do it."

For the first candlelighting, Lyons said, Rabbi Carlebach is arranging for the latkes to be heated, and he will light a lantern as the first candle, while the menorah itself will be comprised of light bulbs.

There will also be a public ceremony for the eighth and final candle on Jan. 1. In between, although there will be no other public ceremony, the menorah will still be lit every day. Lyons will ensure that the correct number of bulbs is glowing each day.

The week is also set to include other Chanukah-related events, including a wine and latke party at Mont Tremblant's Chateau Beauvallon, an evening at the House of Israel Synagogue with CBC's Robert Rabinovitch, and a Shabbat dinner at the shul in memory of Moshe Chaim Carlebach, son of Rabbi Carlebach and his wife Chanie, who died a number of years ago.

On the evening before the first candle – Dec. 24 – the synagogue will also host a "pre-Chanukah" carnival.

Lyons expects a good showing of people for the Tremblant events. "There's a lot of Jewish people with homes in the [Tremblant] area."

On the shul's website, House of Israel president Murray Itscovitch said that Rabbi Carlebach is once again "making sure that we continue to express our joy by keeping the lights burning brightly in the Laurentians."

Eglinton-Lawrence

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"You never think you've done as much as you can until the whole issue is resolved," says veteran politician Joe Volpe, referring to government funding for religious schools, currently extended only to Catholic schools.

The Liberal incumbent in the federal riding of Eglinton-Lawrence and Canada's minister of citizenship and immigration, Volpe says he has made the case for government funding on behalf of constituents, and he expects to continue.

Volpe, who has represented the riding since 1988, won the last election with 28,360 votes, more than twice as many as his closest competitor. His two main competitors for the seat in the Jan. 23 election are first-time candidates Peter Coy for the Conservative party, and Maurganne Mooney, representing the NDP. Patrick Metzger is the Green party candidate.

The riding, which has a population of 106,879 including a sizeable Orthodox community in the Bathurst-Lawrence area, is bounded by Yonge Street and the railway tracks west of Caledonia Road. Highway 401 is its northern boundary, and the southern boundary runs along Eglinton Avenue West.

Before last June's federal election, Volpe told The CJN that Canada's voting record on Israel-related matters at the United Nations had to change.

In his interview last week, he noted a recent improvement, which he said reflected Canadian values, adding that he was pleased that his voice was heard. "I'm excited about the fact that it's starting to move."

On issues closer to home, Volpe responded with a qualified yes when asked whether Canada is doing enough to address security issues. Should a tragedy occur, he said, his answer wouldn't "meet the test of facts."

He noted, however, that current safeguards include the multiple levels of clearance potential immigrants and citizens face.

Since the last election, he added, the federal government has devoted $12 million to fight racism and anti-Semitism. "We've built a series of programs where we are proactive."

Volpe also noted current efforts to improve health care. While people who are sick "probably don't think it's working very well," he noted that Ottawa has allotted an additional $4 billion a year for "delivery of medical services for those in need."

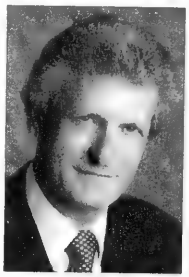
Mooney, a 35-year-old aboriginal court worker, is a longtime activist who most recently advocated for decriminalization of adult prostitution.

Top election issues, in her view, include the environment, health care and gun violence, "which is linked to poverty and social safety net issues."

She would like to see "action on building up our OHIP system" as well as recognition of foreign medical credentials, and the instituting of controls so that "privatized health care doesn't eat at our system."

Peter Coy

Maurganne Mooney



Joe Volpe

Mooney, who was a third-generation member of the Armed Forces, said she does not believe Canada is doing enough to address security issues and the fight against terror. "We [the NDP] support peaceful resolutions."

She also believes more could be done to support Israel, although she said she is just starting to grasp some of the dynamics of the issue.

"The NDP supports peaceful resolution and Israel's right to have safe borders," she said. "We also support Palestinians' right to have their own separate state."

She said it is "discriminatory" to fund one form of religious education and not others, but added there is also a crisis in public school education.

"There have been too many cuts made to our education system. Perhaps if there was more money restored to education, we would have more money for religious education."

A mother of two, Mooney described herself as a strong advocate for child care. "I think the government has a responsibility to have child care spaces available, with a [payment] scale based on your income."

Coy, a British-born business analyst, decided to run because he "just got fed up with the continued mediocrity of the Liberal government."

In the economic sphere, he said, "we're not making the most of our opportunities. The standard of living hasn't risen at all over the last 12 years. We're falling behind in productivity, and [in] our influence in the world."

Locally in Eglinton-Lawrence, where Coy and his family are 14-year residents, he said, "We feel the city's being neglected."

Like Mooney, he cited a lack of adequate public transit. He also noted worsening air quality.

As the recipient of a hip replacement in October, Coy, 54, faced a 14-month wait (eight months from the time he saw his surgeon) "in pain and discomfort" before his operation.

"There's not enough funding from the provinces," he said. "We have to make the resources available to the health-care system and we have to co-ordinate those resources very carefully." That would allow patients to be treated in places with shorter waiting lists, he explained.

Coy said he was "stunned" to learn that Canada recently voted against Israel at the United Nations 11 times and in its favour only four times. "I don't understand how we can't support a democracy – the only democracy in that part of the world."

To protect Canada against terror, he said that border security needs to be beefed up and intelligence services improved.

Like Volpe, he believes education funding is a provincial matter, but said he would represent his constituents' views on funding for religious schools.

Child care, said Coy, is one area that clearly defines the difference between Liberals and Conservatives. The Conservative plan puts money – albeit "not a huge amount" – in the hands of parents, said Coy, who would also promote the idea of day care in the workplace.

Political parties take a stand on Darfur

The Conservative website quotes foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day saying "Canada must do everything possible to encourage a UN coalition of nations, who are willing to show a presence in Darfur, to deter the atrocities of murder, rape and forced evacuation."

During question period prior to parliament's dissolution, Day said, "If the UN is determined to follow the same pattern that led to the Rwandan Genocide, then Canada must urge other nations to join in a multilateral mission to protect the people of Darfur."

A news release on the NDP website quotes foreign affairs critic Alexa McDonough saying, "Canada must urge the UN to take stronger and more tangible action on Darfur. Safety of UN personnel must be of paramount concern but it's imperative that the developments that have led to their removal (after aid workers were attacked) spur the international community into providing a more effective response to the crisis that continues in Sudan."

No external signs of a stroke remain

Hadassah Ein Karem director Dr. Yair Birenbaum, one of the attending physicians, said Sharon "looks fine, feels fine, and he wants to go home."

"We hope to release him tomorrow," Birenbaum said. "He will continue to be observed and evaluated on an ambulatory basis."

A senior aide to Sharon said after visiting him Monday morning that the prime minister's condition had improved overnight, and that there were no external signs of stroke.

"In examinations this morning, he looked good and felt good," said cabinet secretary Yisrael Maimon. "As his doctors informed us, his condition improved overnight.

"He's walking about the room, he's walking by himself. His mood is excellent," Maimon told Army Radio. "He has no deformation, neither in his face nor anywhere else on his body. He looks excellent."

"There is no doubt that what he had last night was mild, very mild," Sharon's longtime personal physician Dr. Boleslav Goldman said early Monday. "He is sleeping well."

On Sunday night, several hours after Sharon was admitted to Hadassah, Goldman said the prime minister was "talking freely, moving and joking.

"Unequivocally, there was no permanent damage caused to him," Goldman said. He added that Sharon's functioning was in no way damaged. "He is talking to everyone now and asking about what's happening, what people are saying and how they are taking the news."

Close to midnight, Sharon spoke to Ha'aretz.

"I'm fine," he said. "Apparently I should have taken a few days off for vacation. But we're continuing to move forward" – a play on the name of his new party, Kadima, which means "forward."

Goldman said Sharon will remain in hospital for at least 24 hours, and possibly for several days.

Sharon's aides reported Sunday night that the prime minister was in a jovial mood after recovering from the effects of the stroke. At one point, he asked whether "the public knows and is taking an interest in what is happening?"

When Maimon retorted that the media were busying themselves with the possibility of an interim prime minister, Sharon asked: "Why? Are there already people interested?"

When Goldman arrived at the hospital from Tel Aviv, Sharon jokingly scolded him, saying, "Why did it take you such a long time to get here?"

Sharon received get-well messages from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and U.S. envoy Elliott Abrams, who was speaking on behalf of the U.S. government, Sharon's aide Raanan Gissin said.

Officials in the White House and U.S. State Department, as well as European Union envoy Javier Solana, also called to wish Sharon a speedy recovery.

On the streets of Gaza City, meanwhile, dozens of armed men from the Popular Resistance Committees, a small but fiercely militant group, fired guns in the air and handed out pastries to motorists to celebrate the news that Sharon was ill.

The celebrations quieted soon after news emerged that the prime minister's life was not in danger, Israel Radio reported.

President Moshe Katsav was in constant touch Sunday evening with Maimon and Hadassah University Hospital, Ein Karem director, Prof. Shlomo Ben Yosef, who updated him on Sharon's condition.

"I wish Sharon a speedy recovery, from the bottom of my heart," MK Benjamin Netanyahu, who is seeking to become Likud chair, said after meeting with Likud activists in Sderot.

Shas chair Eli Yishai and MK Moshe Gafni of United Torah Judaism spoke with cabinet secretary Maimon and sent good wishes to the prime minister. Yishai relayed a message from Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, expressing the rabbi's wishes for the prime minister's speedy recovery.

Conservative rabbi's comment sparks outrage

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Comments by an American rabbi earlier this month at the biennial convention of the Conservative movement caused a flurry of anger among some of the more traditional Canadian attendees.

Speaking at a panel discussion at the meeting, which was held in Boston from Dec. 4 to 8 and devoted to deciding where the movement is headed, Rabbi Menachem Creditor of Temple Beth Israel in Sharon, Mass., said that allowing non-egalitarian synagogues in the Conservative movement is immoral and amounts to "institutional misogyny."

"We were outraged over the language," said Toronto-based Paul Kochberg, president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's (USCJ) Canadian region and one of about two dozen Canadians, out of some 700 participants, at the meeting.

Rabbi Creditor "crossed the line of free speech," Kochberg added, calling the remarks "intemperate and inappropriate." He added that Canadian egalitarians at the meeting were "very supportive of our objections, because there's a strong feeling of pluralism."

In a phone interview with The CJN last week, Rabbi Creditor, 30, who was ordained by the movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) four years ago, said he did not mean that non-egalitarianism is immoral.

"I believe that a movement that espouses conscious change of tradition as part and parcel of tradition cannot advocate change, legitimize a moral response to a question, and then allow the inherited tradition which posed the problem to remain a legitimate option," he explained. In addition to his pulpit, Rabbi Creditor directs the Shefa Network, a group of left-leaning Conservative rabbis.

In the Toronto area, there are only two fully egalitarian Conservative congregations, one in Richmond Hill, and a fledgling congregation in Mississauga. The other six affiliated synagogues are non-egalitarian or partially egalitarian.

Rabbi Creditor's choice of words, the fact he is a member of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly (RA), and the fact there was no counterbalance on the panel precipitated the strong emotional reaction, said Kochberg, who was elected chair of the movement's council of regional presidents at the meeting. Also, he noted, there was no opportunity for rebuttal or interaction during the program.

The four-person panel was responding to an address by JTS philosophy professor Rabbi Neil Gillman, who urged Conservative Judaism to "abandon its claim that we are a halachic movement," which he called "irrelevant to the vast majority of our lay people."

Rabbi Gillman proposed a new definition for the movement based on "living with ambiguity," which he said more precisely describes a movement that may be guided by Jewish law, but evolves according to changing social and cultural norms.

Most lay people interviewed said the constant struggle with tradition gave Conservative Judaism an intellectual honesty that they like.

The panel occurred early in the conference, and Rabbi Jerome Epstein, executive vice-president of USCJ, later reaffirmed publicly the movement's commitment to halachic pluralism.

Rabbi Menachem Creditor

On the Shabbat following the convention, at least two Toronto rabbis raised the issue in their sermons, and last week the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region, which represents 22 Canadian rabbis, released a statement authored by its president, Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

A "new orthodoxy has taken root in the Conservative movement, one that threatens its delicate cohesiveness," he wrote. "In legitimating egalitarianism, this new orthodoxy finds it necessary to delegitimate tradition.

"That the official representatives of the movement have publicly and forcefully repudiated the attack is notable and commendable. But only time will tell whether the Conservative movement will ultimately surrender to a homogenized version of egalitarianism."

In a phone interview last week, Rabbi Allen said that many of his Rabbinical Assembly colleagues in Toronto "see ourselves as dinosaurs, heading towards extinction."

Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, who describes himself as "on the left wing of the right wing," said that a closer embrace of liberal values would cost the movement congregations.

In fact, in a post-convention sermon, Adath Israel Congregation's Rabbi Steven Saltzman – who attended the panel but was not a registered delegate to the convention – proposed the establishment of a Canadian "sovereignty association within the Conservative movement" that would agree to disagree with the American movement.

Rabbi Saltzman told The CJN he was not angered at Rabbi Creditor's comments. He said that, "if 95 per cent of the movement is fundamentally egalitarian, that should be the established norm of the movement, and anyone who is not prepared to live by the norm ought to find another home."

Other key issues in the movement include the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis – an issue that was not formally discussed at the biennial – and the status of non-Jewish family members in synagogue life.

Movement leaders unveiled a plan for outreach to intermarried families. Rabbi Epstein said Conservative congregations should work to bring the entire family into congregational life, encouraging the couple to raise Jewish children and encouraging the non-Jewish spouse to convert. The new initiative proposes special scholarships and extra attention for children of intermarriage.

The outreach document is called Al Ha'derech, or "on the path," an indication that it's not meant to dictate policy but rather suggest a way to guide what the movement is now calling "potential Jews" toward greater Jewish involvement.

Rabbi Scheim of Beth David said he believes that, to a certain extent, local synagogues are already trying to be welcoming to intermarried families. He would like to see similar efforts addressing less affiliated fully Jewish couples as well, he added.

Adath Israel, however, does not allow intermarried Jews to be members, making it an anomaly in the Conservative movement.

Germany backs Israel in face of Iranian threats

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — German Chancellor Angela Merkel plans to visit Israel next month, in part to signal solidarity following recent anti-Israel outbursts by the president of Iran, the government in Berlin said Sunday.

Merkel will travel to Israel in late January, a government spokesperson said on customary condition of anonymity.

The visit will underline "Germany's unconditional defence of Israel's right to exist," she added, confirming a report by the weekly Der Spiegel that one of the trip's aims is to send a signal of opposition to recent comments by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Last week, Ahmadinejad called the Nazi Holocaust a "myth" and said if Europeans insist it did occur, they should give some of their own land for a Jewish state, rather than the one in the Middle East.

The comments came just two months after the hardline president called for Israel to be "wiped off the map."

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier wrote in an article for the Bild am Sonntag newspaper that the Iranian president's comments present a test to German-Iranian relations.

"There is a danger that Iran could become completely isolated internationally," Steinmeier said.

"If Iran wants to be a respected partner of Europe, its president can neither deny historical truths nor threaten Israel," he wrote. "Only an Iran that shows responsibility and keeps to the international rules can be a respected member of the international community."

Steinmeier renewed his warning that Ahmadinejad's outbursts would make talks between European negotiators and Tehran on Iran's nuclear program more difficult.

The remarks sparked outrage in Israel and the United States, and European leaders warned on Saturday they would consider diplomatic options for sanctions against Tehran.

Meanwhile, Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Hamid Reza Asefi said on Sunday that the international reaction to Ahmadinejad's remarks was overblown.

"The West had a very emotional attitude about Ahmadinejad's comments. Westerners have to learn to tolerate others' opinion," he told a press conference, dismissing the European sanctions threat as "baseless and illogical."

Asefi said Ahmadinejad did nothing wrong and was simply articulating Iran's position on Israel.

The response to Ahmadinejad's remarks hiked tensions as Iran and the Europeans prepared to enter a new round of negotiations this week over Iran's nuclear program. The United States accuses Iran of aiming to produce nuclear weapons, a charge denied by Tehran, which says its program is intended only to generate electricity.

In the U.S.-backed talks, the Europeans are trying to rein in the program to ensure it can't produce weapons. Iran, however, has rejected a proposal under which uranium enrichment for its program would be carried out in Russia rather than in Iran.

Asefi said Iran had some propositions for the EU envoys, but would not give further details. "We have several plans on hand to propose to Europe… We have not demanded anything excessive. The European side should not make an excessive demand either," he said.

Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, told the country's state news agency IRNA that the United States and other Western countries are trying to deprive Iran of its achievements.

"Their problem is not with the atomic bomb, they want to thwart Iran's scientific advancements," he said.

Former IDF chief: Saddam's WMDs in Syria

Saddam Hussein moved his chemical weapons to Syria before the U.S.-led war on Iraq began, a former Israeli military chief said. "He transferred the chemical agents from Iraq to Syria," Moshe Ya'alon, who was Israel's top general during Operation Iraqi Freedom, told the New York Sun last week. "No one went to Syria to find them." The remarks came as U.S. President George W. Bush admitted that much of the U.S. intelligence regarding Iraq's weapons of mass destruction was incorrect.

Terrorists kill Israeli

An Israeli man was killed when terrorists opened fire on a vehicle near Beit Hagai in the West Bank. Yossi Shuk, 35, was shot Friday as he was driving near Kiryat Arba close to Hebron, the army said. Islamic Jihad and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, the terrorist arm of the Palestinians' ruling Fatah party, claimed joint responsibility. Shuk, married and a father of five, including a month-old daughter, was critically wounded after being shot in the head. Tensions have escalated in recent days between Israel and Palestinian terrorist groups, especially Islamic Jihad. Israeli troops fired rockets at the Gaza Strip on Friday, a day after six rocket attacks against Israel. Israel shut down the West Bank on Thursday after troops identified and detonated a massive car bomb on the Bethlehem-Jerusalem road following a tip from the Palestinian Authority.

Israel-Egypt trade grows

Egypt's trade with Israel is expected to more than double this year. An agreement that allows Egyptian goods made with at least 11.7 per cent Israeli products to enter the United States free of customs duty is behind the 130 per cent increase in Egyptian-Israeli trade, from $58 million in 2004 to a projected $134 million in 2005, according to figures from the Israeli Export Institute. The United States brokered the Qualified Industrial Zone agreement this year to induce Egypt to take a more prominent role in the Palestinian-Israeli peace process once Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip last summer.

Hamas wins big in cities

Hamas won major West Bank cities in municipal voting. Preliminary results on Friday showed the Islamist terrorist group winning 13 of 15 seats on the Nablus council, eight of 17 seats in Jenin and nine of 15 seats in El Bireh, a large suburb of Ramallah. Analysts said the wins were the result of a split between the old guard and young guard in Fatah, the ruling party of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. In previous rounds of municipal voting, Fatah had managed to hold a lead. Israel has said it will not deal with Hamas should it win a place in government in legislative elections next month.

Israel ponders Iranian nuclear threat

"We have the ability to deal with this and we are making all the preparations to be ready for such a situation," he declared in an early-December news conference.

But does Israel really have a military option against the Iranian nuclear threat? And can it go it alone, as it did against Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor in 1981? Most leading Israeli pundits are skeptical. And some fear election rhetoric could compromise Israeli policy, hurt Israel's international standing and generally prove counterproductive.

Iranian statements over the past few months underline just how dangerous the threat to Israel could be.

In October, Iran's hardline president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said Israel should be "wiped off the map," and earlier this month he said Israel should be dismantled and re-established in Europe or North America.

Israeli officials say a bomb in the hands of leaders with ideas like these adds up to a rogue regime with a predisposition and the means to destroy Israel.

Israel's dilemma is acute: how to get the international community to act without seeming to be goading it into action, or alternatively, how to act itself without incurring international opprobrium or aggravating the situation.

Powerful voices in the international community are cautioning Israel against attacking. In Norway to receive the Nobel Peace Prize earlier this month, the IAEA's director, Mohammed ElBaradei asserted that force simply wouldn't work.

"You cannot use force to prevent a country from obtaining nuclear weapons," he told the Oslo-based Aftenposten. "By bombing them half to death, you can only delay the plans. But they will come back, and they will demand revenge."

It is precisely because of the complexity of the issue that Sharon has been keen to put it on the election agenda. His message is plain: Labor leader Amir Peretz is too inexperienced to handle it, and Likud front-runner Benjamin Netanyahu too unreliable.

Indeed, Netanyahu seemed to play into Sharon's hands by declaring that if he became prime minister, he would bomb Iran's nuclear facilities the way Israel bombed the Iraqi reactor under former prime minister Menachem Begin.

This drew a sharp response from Ha'aretz. "Whoever publicly recommends an Israeli military option sins doubly. He incites the Israeli public unnecessarily; presents Israel as pushing the U.S. into a major new war; drags this sensitive subject into the overheated rhetoric of an election campaign; and invites Iranian threats and various anti-Israel reactions," the paper wrote in an editorial.

Official Israeli policy remains deliberately vague.

On the one hand, Israeli officials insist that for now the policy is to help mobilize international pressure on Tehran, but they refuse to rule out a future Israeli military strike.

"At the moment, in the current phase, the focus is in the sphere of international diplomacy," Amos Gilead, head of the Defense Ministry's strategic policy team, explained on Israel TV. But then, commenting on the Sunday Times story, he said he denied "the specifics" of the report, including the timetables and the Israeli intelligence operation in northern Iraq. But, he added, "it's impossible to say in advance that all the options will be ruled out."

Leading Israeli pundits, however, doubt whether Israel really has a military option.

Writing in the Ma'ariv newspaper, analyst Ben Caspit pointed out the chief difference between Iraq in 1981 and Iran today: Whereas Iraq's nuclear capacity was concentrated in one weakly guarded reactor, Iran's fuel enrichment program uses centrifuges housed in several well-protected sites across the huge country.

"To attack, we would need a lot of intelligence, multiple strikes, the ability to hover over Iran for long periods and in large numbers, lots of luck, lots of bunker-busting bombs, and with all that, the chances of success would be slight," Caspit wrote.

The former commander of the Israeli air force, reserve Maj. Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliyahu, said that if there is an attack some time in the future, Israel would only be part of a larger force – partly because the job is just too big for Israel to handle alone.

There would be too many targets, each target would need several fighter-bombers, protected by fighters, accompanied by rescue planes to pick up crew members who might be shot down, he argued.

"Maybe," Ben-Eliyahu said, "there will be a joint decision for joint action one day, involving countries like the U.S., Britain, Germany and Turkey."

Reuven Pedatzur, a strategist at the Netanya Academic College, said he doubts that any such joint action will ever materialize. Nor is it likely, he said, that Israel or any of the other players will take action to stop Iran alone.

"Iran may well come to possess nuclear arms," Ben-Eliyahu said. "And if that happens, Israel will have to learn to live with the Iranian threat and to neutralize it by means of credible deterrence."

Israel's deterrent capacity is impressive. Its Arrow anti-missile defence system is the most advanced of its kind in the world.

Israel, according to foreign sources, also has an impressive second-strike capability: it has F-15 fighter bombers that can reach Iran without refuelling, Dolphin submarines that can launch nuclear weapons from the sea, and it has long-range missiles of it own.

Theoretically, an Iranian nuclear attack on Israel could be blocked by the Arrow system, while an Israeli second strike could destroy Iran.

That equation, strategists like Pedatzur believe, should be enough to deter Ahmadinejad and the ayatollahs who effectively rule Iran, even if they do finally manage to produce a bomb.

Montreal-born actor lands roles in big-budget films

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Just as Montreal-born actor Sasha Roiz begins to chug back his morning coffee, he starts to laugh.

"I had no idea things would work out like this," says Roiz, chuckling.

Acting professionally for only three years, the 31-year-old has had more success than many people who have been in the business for years. Fresh out of theatre school he landed a role in the huge summer blockbuster The Day After Tomorrow, and followed that up with parts in Attack On Precinct 13, and the upcoming 16 Blocks with Bruce Willis. However, until the big movies came calling, Roiz wasn't sure how the acting biz would work out.

"I was always kind of confident with what I could do," he says. "But I had no idea what to expect. It's always hard to fathom how it's going to work."

No one, especially Roiz, would have expected his first audition, let alone his first role, to be for the multi-million dollar hit, The Day After Tomorrow.

"I started doing a lot of theatre in Montreal, and then the very first on- camera thing I had to do was for The Day After Tomorrow. It was really quite the initiation when that's the first bit of camera work you're doing and it's a $200 million film with massive sets. I couldn't even figure out which camera I was looking for. I was terrified, but it was great."

Working with Dennis Quaid and Jake Gyllenhaal gave Roiz valuable insight into the world of big budget films, but it was his parents who got the most out of the experience.

"It was a lot of fun for me, but it was more bragging rights for my parents than anything. For my dad to be able to call his friends around the world and tell them they could see me on the screen, it was great."

For Roiz's Ukrainian father, having his son act in a blockbuster didn't just allow him to show off to his pals, it legitimized his career choice.

"For immigrant parents it's always a nightmare when your kids go into anything not stable, because stability is all they've ever wanted," says Roiz. "He sees how hard I've been working and [my parents] are thrilled for me now. Plus my brother got into law school so that's left me to do whatever I want."

Finding out their son wanted to act for a living wasn't the first time Roiz's parents questioned his career path. Before the actor headed to the big screen he was the drummer for the Juno nominated rock band, Tricky Woo.

"The band started in my parents' basement," says Roiz, who hasn't played drums since leaving the band five years ago.

Like his acting career, Tricky Woo's rise to success was brisk.

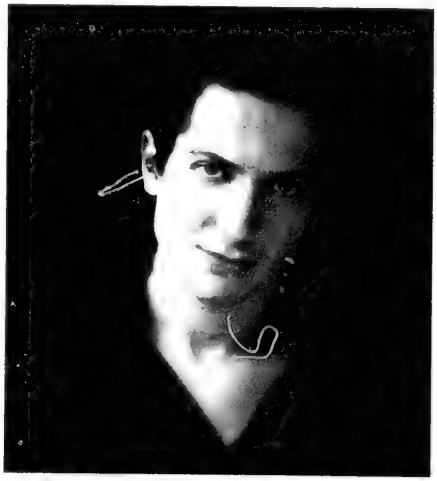
"Again, it's just one of those things. It just went and suddenly we had Juno nominations and toured all over the place. It was fantastic. I think it's what gave me the courage to go into acting."

Roiz quit the band to go to theatre school, but he couldn't leave rock and roll behind just like that - he managed Tricky Woo until they disbanded in 2001.

"I was in school, but I kept running to pay phones all the time and talking to agents and doing publicity. I think everyone in theatre school thought I was dealing drugs," he jokes.

Roiz's time in Tricky Woo helped him discover an important thing about himself – he could sing. This discovery eventually led him to the Lord of the Rings musical, where he almost landed a role.

"I almost ended up in Lord of the Rings," he says proudly. "I went through all the auditions and I could have had the part if I wanted it. But I didn't want to be tied to the production."



Sasha Roiz has role in upcoming Willis film

Normally, you'd have to be nuts not to take a part in one of the most anticipated musicals of the year, but when you're in movies with Bruce Willis, like he is in 16 Blocks, turning down such an important role is understandable. In this Richard Donner directed film, Roiz plays Kaller, a bad cop who tries to stop Willis' good cop character.

"It's not really more than chasing Bruce," he says. "There were a lot of chase scenes and a lot of gun shooting."

But running after Willis wasn't the best part about filming 16 Blocks. After working for 10 days in New York, the still-green actor returned to Toronto more confident about his career choice than ever before.

"It was really exciting to be in New York. As an actor, to be there for any kind of work is great. You feel like you've arrived."

New Canadian edition of The Book of Lists

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Max Bluestein controlled the gambling scene in Toronto in the 1950s.

When Johnny Papalia, a Hamilton-based underworld boss, wanted a piece of the gambling action in Toronto, Bluestein refused to negotiate. So Papalia resorted to some non-verbal persuasion methods.

On March 21, 1961, three of Papalia's goons beat Bluestein with an iron bar and brass knuckles, and then ground a broken bottle into his mouth.

He survived, but never fingered Papalia. Nor did the hundreds of witnesses in the bar that night. Columnist Pierre Berton called it "the most remarkable case of mass blindness in scientific history."

This story is among the many unusual tidbits of information in the inaugural Canadian edition of The Book of Lists: The original compendium of curious information (Knoff Canada, 2005), compiled by American siblings David Wallechinsky and Amy Wallace, and Canadian CBC producers Ira Basen and Jane Farrow.

The 2005 Book of Lists (there are American and Canadian editions) is a revival of the 1977 U.S. version, a bestseller by the late popular novelist Irving Wallace and his son, Wallechinsky.

Longtime CBC radio producer Basen, and his colleague Farrow, a radio producer and host, put together the Canadian Book of Lists last winter. In a recent interview, Basen explained that he and Farrow gathered a lot of Canadian content, but they also incorporated information previously collected by their U.S. co-authors.

"We tried to find Canadian content for all the lists," Basen said. "When we couldn't find any, we left the [original] list."

For example, he pointed out that there is no Canadian equivalent for underworld nicknames like Charles "Lucky" Luciano, "Scarface" Al Capone or Israel "Ice Pick Willie" Alderman, so he created another category about Canadians.

"There were no Canadian mobsters with great nicknames like the Americans… I wanted to recognize the existence of Canadian mobsters. So we decided to leave that list and do that other list on Mob hits."

The original Book of Lists was preceded by The People's Almanac, published in 1974, Basen said. "I got it as a present. It was a smart and interesting list.

"New editions of the Book of Lists continued to appear until Irving Wallace's death in the early '80s. My parents had that in their bathroom. I have a lot of lingering affection for the original."

CBC producers co-wrote Lists book

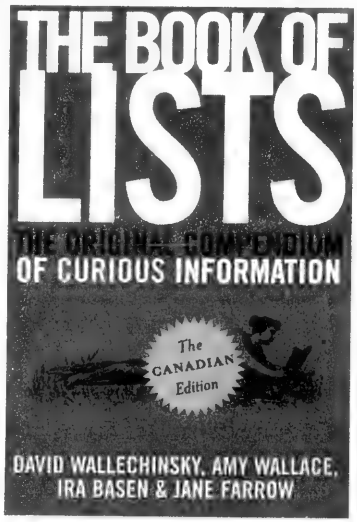
He noted that Amy Wallace worked on those books as well.

When the siblings Wallace and Wallechinsky resurrected the franchise of the Book of Lists, they decided to have different editions from different countries, Basen noted, adding that a British edition appeared in 2004.



The U.S. editors approached Random House (Canada) to publish a full Canadian edition and asked Farrow, the author of two volumes of Wanted Words, to do the Book of Lists. "Jane convinced him to sign me on."

The editor knew Basen and had already signed him at different publishing house to do a book on media spin and publicity, but had to convince the senior boss at Random House, that Basen was the right person for the list project.

"One of the ways this editor was able to do it, was to tell his boss about a good-by party I had for Jane. [She had gone to Chicago for a year.] As part of my speech, I gave a list of things that had been invented in Chicago, as a joke. So as part of his pitch, he said, 'Ira already thinks of lists all the time.'"

Unlike their American counterparts who had more than 20 contributors over a 30-year time span, Basen and Farrow had the daunting task of doing all the research themselves within a four-month period, Basen said. "I had no idea how to find some of the things. We were intimidated. The [American] lists were so amazing and so esoteric… My only contact with Wallace and Wallechinsky was in one conference call."

He said they spent a lot of time at the library and on the web and sometimes they just got lucky. They happened to stumble across the biography of R.B. Bennet, prime minister of Canada from 1930 to 1935. "One of the things we found out about him was that he died in his bathtub. So we tacked this on to the American list of Famous Things That Happened in Bathtubs."

Sometimes he happened to know about a story, like that of Bluestein. It was a piece of history, Toronto native Basen was aware of as a child. He had grown up around the corner from Bluestein in the Eglinton and Bathurst area. "I didn't know him. Everyone in the neighbourhood knew that a mobster lived there. You never went too close to his house.

"When I put together mob hits I included him because they could have killed him. They wanted to send him a message. Gambling was so lucrative, other crime families wanted to get into it. They beat him within an inch of his life."

There are 30,000 copies of the book, which is a big run for a Canadian book, and it is being sold by many retailers, not only bookstores, and there are plans for a mass-market paperback edition, a smaller and cheaper version, Basen said.

"We're on the subway ads. We're hoping to catch a wave. If this book catches on, we can do a second edition that gets written by the readers.

"We fully expect to get all kinds of e-mails at thebookoflists@Randomhouse.com. We never pretended this was a comprehensive list. If there are any leads on who can tell us about a Canadian who died laughing, please tell us. We want to fill in the gaps that we were not able to do."

CHAVA ALBERSTEIN – 'ISRAEL'S JOAN BAEZ' – PERFORMS HERE WITH LES YEUX NOIRS

The Ashkenaz Foundation presents Israel's legendary political songstress Chava Alberstein and France's virtuosic Jewish-Gypsy ensemble Les Yeux Noirs in concert.

Alberstein, who begins a North American tour with this performance, has been lauded as Israel's version of Joan Baez and the voice of her nation's conscience because of her anti-government political views. Known for their fusion of Yiddish, Gypsy and manouche (French Gypsy) music, Les Yeux Noirs was founded by the Jewish Slabiak brothers. Members of the group play violin, accordion, cello, guitar, cimbalom, bass and percussion.

The concert is a fundraiser for the Ashkenaz Foundation and 2006 Ashkenaz Festival. George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre for the Arts. Saturday, Jan. 21, 7:30 p.m. Regular tickets $25-$75. Ticketmaster, 416-872-1111, or www.ticketmaster.ca. Patron tickets start at $250 and include a post-concert gala reception. 416-979-9901 or www.ashkenazfestival.com

Names in the News: According to a recent profile in London's Jewish Chronicle, Pinchas Zukerman is a huge fan of ice hockey – but that shouldn't surprise anyone who knows that the Israeli violin virtuoso has been music director of Canada's National Arts Centre Orchestra in Ottawa since 1998. The Chronicle story offered an additional revelation of considerable local interest. Zukerman, it seems, "has painstakingly built an education program for the next generation of music-makers, starting by giving every child in the province of Ontario the humblest of musical instruments – the recorder."

TJFF Chai Tea: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival presents the third in its Chai Tea series with Va, Vis et Deviens (Live and Become, 2005). Made by Romanian-born French director Radu Mihaileanu, the film was one of the hits of the last Toronto International Film Festival. It tells the heartwarming story of a young Ethiopian boy whose mother attempts to have him pose as one of the Ethiopian Jews being airlifted to Israel from a Sudanese refugee camp. In French and Hebrew. $15. Sheppard Grande Cinema (Sheppard and Yonge). Sunday, Jan. 22. Tea 4 p.m., film 5 p.m.

Spielberg's Munich is hard-hitting and soul-searching

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Steven Spielberg's much anticipated new film, Munich, which opens in local theatres on Dec. 23, works on two levels.

It is, first and foremost, a Middle East thriller, turning on an Israeli covert hit squad whose mission is to avenge the deaths of Israeli athletes killed by Palestinian members of Black September at the 1972 Summer Olympics in Munich, Germany.

In the wake of that horrific incident, Israel bombed PLO bases in Lebanon and Syria, but it also carried out a series of deep undercover assassinations – which it has never officially acknowledged – aimed at eliminating the masterminds of the Munich massacre. Golda Meir, the Israeli prime minister, wanted to strike fear into the hearts of all Palestinians bent on terrorizing Israel.

The Mossad, having been handed the audacious and dangerous assignment, executed the plan in Europe, but at some cost to its own operatives.

Yet Munich, based on a riveting, though questionably accurate, book by Canadian writer George Jonas and a brooding script by Tony Kushner and Eric Roth, is more than just a routine bang-bang thriller.

Munich, at its core, is a political meditation on Israel's bitter, increasingly bloody struggle with the Palestinians over the ownership of a historically, religiously and strategically important strip of real estate.

There are constant references to this overarching theme, and because this intrinsically interesting film is inspired by real events, Spielberg, one of Hollywood's most accomplished directors, can take liberties and bend facts to suit his own artistic needs.

The movie, shot on location in Malta and Hungary, revolves around a young and inexperienced Israeli intelligence officer named Avner (Eric Bana).

The son of a Holocaust survivor and a war hero, Avner is recruited by Ephraim (Geoffrey Rush), a tough-as-nails, emotionally distant Mossad agent who typifies Israeli resolution.

Avner, played with cool detachment by Bana, must leave behind his pregnant wife (Ayelet Zurer) and relinquish his identity and health benefits to join the team.

Before he is dispatched, Avner meets Golda Meir (Lynn Cohen), portrayed as a motherly, soft-spoken figure who bewails the deaths of Jews in Germany and remarks, "We have to show them [the Palestinians] we're strong." As well, Avner has a curt meeting with the Mossad's paymaster, an unsentimental Galicianer who insists on receiving receipts for all expenses incurred.

Golda Meir, played by Lynn Cohen

Avner's teammates are a hardy bunch. Steve (Daniel Craig, the new James Bond) is the gung-ho South African getaway driver. Hans (Hanns Zischler) is a cerebral German Jew adept at forging documents. Robert (Mathieu Kassovitz), a Belgian toymaker, has a knack for building explosive devices. Carl (Ciaran Hinds), an older man, is in charge of keeping the sometimes chaotic operation on an even keel and monitoring expenses. These actors acquit themselves with aplomb.

As the Israelis go about their deadly business, taking care not to harm innocent civilians, they are torn between their desire to kill the 11 Palestinians believed to have planned the Munich murders and their own growing doubts about their stealth operation.

Robert grouses that he was trained to dismantle bombs, not to set them off. And in a titanic battle with his conscience, he wonders whether he is acting righteously in the best Jewish tradition.

Avner, having been shell-shocked by the brutal methods the team must use to hunt down the Palestinians and a wily Dutch sympathizer, is most beset by moral qualms.

He asks some hard questions. If the Palestinians committed crimes, why didn't we arrest them? Are we killing terrorists or Palestinians? The latter is a particularly loaded question. And in a penetrating moment, Avner expresses doubt whether the operation will bring the desired result: peace. Indeed, the film's subtext is that Israelis and Palestinians are killing each other needlessly.

The Palestinian case is given ample airing. A Palestinian woman cries out that Israel has spilled the blood of her compatriots. A Palestinian man, claiming that Jews exploit Christian guilt over the Holocaust, voices a steely determination to fight the Israelis for as long as it takes. "Home is everything," he says in a reference to a land he has never even seen.

Through Avner's mother (Gila Almagor), Spielberg makes the case for Israel's legitimacy. She assures Avner that his mission is right, both for Jews and Israel. "We have a piece of land on earth at last," she declares, citing Zionist mantra.

Her cri de coeur, however, is qualified by one of Avner's fellow hitmen. In a tart observation brimming with the imperatives of Realpolitik, he asks: "How do you think we gained control of the land? By being nice?"

But this harsh comment is balanced off by a sympathetic remark proffered by a sleazy French businessman whose stock in-trade is valuable information. Since the world has been "rough" with your "tribe," he muses, you have a right to deal ruthlessly with your enemies.

Munich, a hard-hitting, soul-searching two-and-a-half hour film, pulsates with action and reflects the dilemmas of a conflict whose end is hardly in sight. Some viewers may not like it, but no one will be indifferent to it.

Radiant Days, Haunted Nights: Great Tales from the Treasury of Yiddish Folk Literature, edited by Joachim Neugroschel (Overlook Press)

This intriguing collection of obscure Yiddish folk tales, translated for the first time by Joachim Neugroschel, spans more than four centuries. It begins with the midrashic Song of Isaac, written by an anonymous author about 1510, and concludes with numerous tales from Europe in the 1920s. Most of the contents date ostensibly from the early 20th century.

Unlike traditional literary stories, folk tales are typically handed down the generations anonymously in multiple variants: they are the straw that talented writers often use to spin into gold. This collection boasts many famous authors – S. Ansky, Mendele Moykher Sforim, Der Nister, Sholem Aleichem and Sholom Asch – as well as many lesser names, offering many intriguing tales.

The anonymous Story of Bovo dates from 10th-century Denmark and, as Neugroschel explains, was drawn from the Arabian Nights. It took 500 years to filter into Yiddish culture, initially as a mock verse epic, then as prose. It circulated widely in pamphlet form throughout the 19th century and was highly popular among Ashkenazim.

In The Fish That Swallowed the Prophet Jonah, Mendele Moykher Sforim offers a well-reasoned conjecture, supported by popular and scientific evidence, that the aforesaid sea-creature was a shark, not a whale as often supposed. Master humourist Sholem Aleichem makes a rare excursion into popular fantasy with The Red Jews, in which he describes a fictitious tribe who live beyond the Sambatyon River and have lost most of their Hebrew, except for a few words and phrases like "interest-free loan," "cash on the barrelhead," "charity," "alms," "lekhaim," "mealtime" and "meshugge."

Perhaps the most surprising inclusion is the anonymously written Sir Gawain, dating from 1789, a Yiddish version of the popular Arthurian legend, retaining the same heroic knight but minus the Christian quest for the holy grail.

With this diverse assortment of tales, Neugroschel, an accomplished translator, opens a welcome gate onto a verdant but rarely visited pasture.

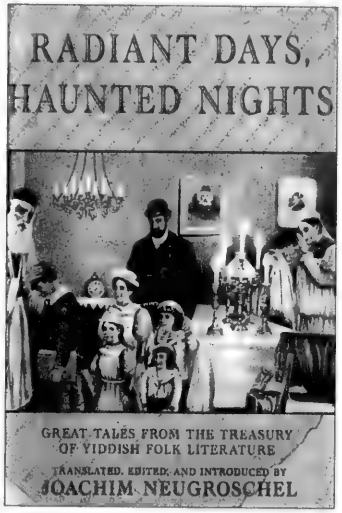
A Crack in the Edge of the World: America and the Great California Earthquake of 1906. Non-fiction by Simon Winchester (HarperCollins)

The bestselling author of The Professor and the Madman and Krakatoa opens this recent non-fiction book with a view of the earth from the moon and a description of the tiny momentary ripples an astronaut with a powerful telescope might have discerned in the vicinity of southern California when the earth cracked apart at San Francisco nearly a century ago.

In fact, those brief perturbations, the result of a tumultuous subterranean grinding of tectonic plates in collision, measured 8.25 on the Richter scale. The San Francisco quake wrecked 490 blocks, toppled some 25,000 buildings, broke open gas mains, cut off electrical power and sparked enormous fires, leaving 700 people dead and a quarter million homeless.



Winchester tells the story masterfully, balancing scientific and human-interest concerns against a wider exploration of modern planetary geology. Not since John McPhee has anyone written so engagingly and dramatically about the earth's geological processes.

Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close.
A novel by Jonathan Safran Foer. (Houghton Mifflin)

Safran Foer illuminates everything in the comic, traumatized life of Oskar Schell, his nine-year-old hero, whose childishly eccentric quest begins after he loses his father in the World Trade Center on 9/11. Equal parts Holden Caulfield, Leopold Bloom and an underaged Hamlet, Oskar roams New York in search of the lock that will fit the mysterious key that his father left behind.

Oskar's spunky, fanciful imagination and juvenile sense of humour transform his lugubrious mission into one of picaresque hilarity as he encounters a motley assortment of characters from Coney Island to Harlem. The book, like the story, is filled with many distractions, as when the text gives way to drawings, photographs, scribblings and other diversions. It's as if the novelistic structure is being purposely reduced to a pile of smoking rubble like the Twin Towers. By the end, even time seems to disintegrate, at least in Oskar's telling.

Hailed as a literary wunderkind for his earlier novel Everything Is Illuminated, which was recently translated worthily into film, Foer again demonstrates his marvellous inventiveness, ease of expression, ear for comic dialogue and knack for poetic and experimental prose. Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close also demonstrates an artistic vision in full force, from which we may continue to expect good things.

Shakespeare: The Biography, by Peter Ackroyd (Chatto & Windus, London)

Despite a paucity of original sources, many biographers have attempted to fill the void in literary history that Shakespeare left behind. The most recent is British novelist and literary scholar Peter Ackroyd, who expertly weaves the scarce primary material with much illuminating secondary material plus his comprehensive knowledge of London and his deep understanding of Elizabethan society and stage. The result is an extraordinary and intimate account of "the Bard" at nearly 500 pages.

Shakespeare "wrote at extreme speed and intensity; he seems to have been able to summon up the energy and the inspiration at will, with the words and cadences emerging from some deep well of his being. He left some lines unfinished in the rapidity and restlessness of creation… He hardly ever punctuated, preferring to rely instead upon the roll and rush of creation. In some instances he seems to have left spaces between his words, where punctuation marks could be inserted after the fit had passed. He did not mark act or scene divisions… Samuel Johnson remarked that the endings of his plays were sometimes written with undue haste, as if the exigencies of the moment forced him to hurry."

Readers of Ackroyd's earlier biography of Dickens (or, for that matter, Ezra Pound, T.S. Eliot, William Blake and Thomas More) will already appreciate his gift for presenting his thoughtful discussions in a most satisfying lucid and logical manner. His writerly imagination allows him to go places that most scholars have hitherto failed to penetrate.

World Medical Association honours Ontario doctor

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Dr. May Cohen, medical practitioner, researcher and professor emeritus in the department of family medicine at McMaster University in Hamilton and an indefatigable advocate for women's health issues, was recently honoured by the World Medical Association (WMA).

Cohen is one of 65 physicians from 58 countries selected for international recognition in a coffee table book, Caring Physicians of the World, which was recently published by the WMA for distribution at its general assembly in October in Santiago, Chile.

Dr. May Cohen

The publication notes that these physicians represent "the finest traditions of our great profession and show how physicians today are working to the highest professional standards in different cultures and under different pressures."

Cohen has displayed these qualities in what she refers to as "my two careers in medicine – one as a practising family physician in Toronto and then as an educator and advocate for women patients and physicians." She served as president of the Federation of Medical Women of Canada from 1991-1992.

Born in Montreal in 1931, Cohen grew up in Toronto. Her father, Sam Lipshitz, a community leader who had come from Poland when he was 17, and her mother, Manya, a teacher, were politically left of centre and worked tirelessly for equality, justice and guaranteed human rights.

"I absorbed the importance of this mission as I was growing up," Cohen says.

Cohen attended Harbord Collegiate, where she graduated as the top student in Ontario, and graduated from medicine at the University of Toronto in 1955 as the Gold Medalist for academic excellence. She was awarded eight scholarships.

She knew Gerry Cohen from the time they were in pre-kindergarten. They married when May was 21. Gerry practised family medicine in Toronto and Hamilton, and he quips that May was always slightly ahead of him at school.

"I have no traditional biases regarding gender role expectations," Gerry says. "I know how proud I feel about May's accomplishments."

May received a Medical Research Council scholarship after graduation and pursued two years of endocrinology study. She wanted to continue in a medical specialty, she says, but "we wanted to have children, so in 1957, I joined Gerry in our general family practice in Bathurst Manor."

She often put her own personal needs second to her responsibilities as a physician and a wife and mother.

"For the individual patient," she says, "I share with that patient my best knowledge and ability, but at the same time recognize that I must respect the fact that while I may possess greater biologic and medical knowledge, the patient is in the best position to know what is best for his or her life."

In 1977, May and Gerry were recruited by the department of family medicine in the Faculty of Health Sciences at McMaster University in Hamilton where they would teach and practice family medicine. May later became associate dean of health services in the Faculty of Health Sciences.

"May has enhanced the relationship between hospitals, universities and the community," Gerry said in an interview.

She retired from McMaster in 1998 and says she is busier than ever. Her legacy continues with the establishment of the annual Eli Lilly-May Cohen Chair in Women's Health at McMaster.

Among her many other awards, Cohen was the City of Hamilton's Women of the Year in 1986, she received the Governor General's Award in 1945 for her contribution to the equality of women in Canada, and the Canadian Medical Association's Medal of Service in 2000. She was inducted into the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction in 2001.

"As a woman physician and a family doctor occupying a major leadership role in medicine, I also found it very important to be seen as a role model by younger women in medicine," she says, adding she is pleased that there are more and more women in medicine.

"Going to McMaster was the best thing that happened to us – to learn from brilliant people in all kinds of specialties, [by] teaching residents, you have to learn, developing research skills and having the opportunity to explore. A world opened for both of us."

The second half of her medical career began in the 1970s. She was invited to facilitate a workshop in Shelburne, N.S., where she says she became aware of the unmet health-care needs of women who shared their experiences with her.

"This inspired me to begin to advocate for the improved health care of women through curricular and health system changes."

While on sabbatical in 1988 in Australia, she says she was "inspired by health-care professionals who were doing so much to define women's health and to develop appropriate health care facilities to meet the needs of women.

"One of the turning points in my medical career occurred after attending to a young, dying mother of a nine-month-old baby who was brought into the emergency room of a local hospital following an illegal abortion." That's when she became an advocate for the pro-choice movement.

She believes that scientific knowledge is the absolute foundation of the practice of medicine, but it is not sufficient to make a caring and competent physician or academic.

What she finds most difficult, she says, is seeing the profession becoming more and more a business, and observing that many physicians have become cynical, disillusioned, resistant to change.

"They appear to ignore the personal satisfaction and privilege that are the real rewards of being physicians and the awareness that medicine has responsibility as a social good."

Former IDF chief sued in U.S.

By SHMUEL ROSNER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Moshe Ya'alon [File photo]

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A group of Lebanese nationals has filed a civil suit against former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon for war crimes and other human rights violations.

The class action suit, filed by the Center for Constitutional Rights (CCR), is in relation to the hundreds of civilian deaths and injuries in the 1996 shelling by the IDF of a United Nations compound in south Lebanon's Kafr Kana.

The lawsuit was filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

CCR attorney Jamil Dakwar told Ha'aretz that the amount of compensation would be determined by the jury at the trial.

Ya'alon is currently in Washington, D.C., as a research fellow at the Washington Institute.

CCR and the Palestinian Center for Human Rights (PCHR) have filed a class action suit against Avi Dichter, the former head of the Shin Bet security service. That suit was submitted on behalf of the family members of 14 Palestinians who were killed when the IDF dropped a one-ton bomb on a Gaza neighbourhood in July 2002 during the targeted killing of Hamas leader Salah Shehadeh. The compensation sought in that case is estimated in the millions of dollars.

Unlike previous suits for damages against senior Israeli defense officials, the suits submitted against Ya'alon and Dichter will be processed by U.S. courts because the two are currently staying in the United States.

Hamas leader rejects EU warning to halt aid

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

DAMASCUS — The political leader of Hamas on Monday rejected the European Union's warning to halt aid to the Palestinian Authority if the militant Palestinian group wins next month's parliamentary elections but fails to renounce violence.

The leader, Khaled Mashaal, dismissed the EU's move as "a flagrant interference" in the Palestinians' internal affairs and urged the Palestinian Authority not to bow to EU pressure.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana said Sunday that European taxpayers would have a hard time supporting the Palestinian Authority if it included a party that supports violence and advocates Israel's destruction.

"It would be very difficult for the help and the money that goes to the Palestinian Authority to continue to flow," Solana told reporters in Tel Aviv.

The EU's stand "harms its advocates and the European stand, more than it can harm Hamas," Mashaal told the Associated Press by telephone in Damascus. "It reflects the double-standard policy and playing with the values of democracy and freedom.

"So long as people have opted for democracy, they should respect its results and should not confiscate the right of the Palestinian people to choose [their leaders]," Mashaal said.

He added that the Palestinian people would not accept "such a flagrant intervention" in their internal affairs and would not bow to "such pressures."

The Palestinians receive about $1 billion a year (US) in international aid – about half the Palestinian Authority's budget – and EU assistance is slated to reach 260 million euros ($312 million US) in 2006.

The EU warning reflected growing international concern that Hamas, which has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings and remains committed to Israel's destruction, could win the Jan. 25 parliamentary vote.

Hamas, labelled a terrorist organization by the United States and Israel, swept municipal elections in several West Bank cities last week.

Mashaal also reiterated that Hamas would not renew a truce with Israel when it expires at the end of the year. "The general climate in light of the continuing Zionist aggression and [Israel's] refusal to release Palestinian detainees does not encourage us to renew the truce," he said.

Ex-McGill player now coaches the defence

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Shuffling across the ice, Adam Shell isn't wearing McGill University's legendary red and white jersey, nor is he twirling a hockey stick in his hands, as he has done in past years.

Instead, he's sporting a crisp new suit and grasping a clipboard.

Shell, 25, is an assistant hockey coach with the McGill Redmen of Canadian Interuniversity Sport (CIS), a team he suited up for during his four years as a McGill undergraduate.

Now, he's living a double life – as an accountant by day and a hockey coach by night. He's trying to learn all he can so he can climb the coaching ranks for a chance to lead an NHL squad to the Stanley Cup.

"Once I stopped playing, it took me a little time to realize that coaching is the profession that I wanted to pursue. I started with coaching minor for two years, while I was completing my CA, and then this opportunity at McGill came to fruition," said Shell, who is originally from Thornhill.

Shell played junior A hockey with the Shelbourne Wolves and Thornhill Rattlers before enjoying four solid seasons with the Redmen.

With him coaching the defence, the team is off to its best start in club history, enjoying an impressive, 10-0-2 record – good enough to be ranked second in Canada. They've also allowed only 13 goals, the least in the country.

Shell credits much of the success to the coach he once played for.

"It is a much different relationship going from playing for [McGill head coach Martin Raymond] to being an assistant to him. I truly enjoy it," Shell said. "Marty has been a true mentor for me."

Considering the balancing act with his own schedule – working for Pricewaterhouse Coopers during the day, coaching at night and trying to enjoy life in his 20s – Shell could be a role model to many.

He said his busy lifestyle is rewarding, and it's also the best way to stay off the couch.

"I am lucky to work at PricewaterhouseCoopers, who have been quite flexible in allowing me the time to get to the rink. Generally, I work for the firm from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and then [I go] to the rink till about 9 p.m.," Shell said.

"This past semester was quite taxing, though, as most weekends are spent travelling. That adds to the toll on the body and health."

Always a student of the game, Shell enjoys coaching the many young players on the team. One of them is rookie Sam Bloom, 19, a Toronto native who played two years of junior A hockey with the North York Rangers.

"I have gotten in some games. It's a good team and been a good experience," said Bloom, a man of few words, while preparing for exams. "You're busy a lot, but it depends on how much time you want to spend."

The management student, who has a Jewish father, has one goal and two assists in 10 games this season. Bloom plays forward, so his interaction with Shell is limited. Nonetheless, he said he enjoys Shell's leadership and how he relates to the players.

Shell is hoping that after a few years with McGill, he will earn the opportunity to take his coaching to a higher level.

But even if he achieves his dream, he wouldn't be the first Jewish head coach in the NHL.

Cecil Hart – a direct descendant of Canada's first Jewish settler Aaron Hart – holds that distinction. Hart coached the Montreal Canadiens to Stanley Cup championships in 1929-30 and 1930-31. He is a member of the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

Maybe, one day, Shell will be there too.

Beth Tfiloh teams take titles in hoops tourney

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The boys and girls basketball teams of Beth Tfiloh Hebrew School in Baltimore both walked away as champions from the 10th annual Israel Becker Basketball Tournament hosted by the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Nine teams from Boston, Baltimore and Toronto and about 200 players, coaches and teachers participated in the weekend-long tournament that took place from Dec.7 to Dec. 11 at CHAT's Downsview campus and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

While Beth Tfiloh's varsity girls team coasted to a 37-22 win against the Gann Academy girls varsity basketball team from Boston, the boys' game was a nail-biter to the very end.

The Beth Tfiloh Warriors boys team faced the CHAT Tigers in the final, and from the start, these two evenly matched teams kept the score close.

Although the Tigers trailed by 10 points at the half, they quickly regained their composure and managed to narrow the lead.

With less than a minute left in the fourth quarter, the Tigers were within three points of the Warriors.

Tunny Warner, the 17-year-old CHAT senior and the Tigers' MVP, scored a game-tying three-pointer that sent the home crowd into an early celebration.

But in dramatic fashion, Beth Tfiloh's Paul Auster, 16, silenced Tiger supporters when he drove to the basket in the dying seconds to give his team a two-point lead and a 46-44 win with only two seconds left on the clock.

"It feels excellent," said Auster, just moments after being named the tournament's MVP.

"I mean, we came here with a plan to win and thank God we competed and won against a great team."

He added that the only thing running through his head when he had possession of the ball with just five seconds left in regulation time was that he needed to go for the win.

"It was exciting. My heart was racing and thank God I made [the shot]."

Cindy Kipper, the development co-ordinator of the tournament, which was chaired by Marla Rosenfeld, said she was pleased that the event was a success.

"In terms of the games themselves and the comradery of the teams, the tournament was a success," she said.

The tournament was established 10 years ago by the friends of Israel Becker, a 1988 CHAT graduate who was killed in a car accident.

"Because it was established by classmates of Israel Becker – sports were so important to him and his friends wanted to pay tribute to his life – the fact that they still have this in mind is wonderful," Kipper said.

"This is a tournament to remember Israel Becker and what he's done for this school and it's just a way for Jewish athletes to get to know each other, to meet each other," said Auster, who has played with the Warriors for two years.

Kipper said that this was a big undertaking for CHAT, both logistically and financially, and that without the help from the CHAT community, generous donations and parents who opened their homes to the visiting teams, it may not have been such a success.

Sandie Benitah
20 Something

I'm finally on my own.

The fridge has food I like to eat. The sofa has pillows I chose myself. On TV is a show only I like to watch.

I sit on my couch and survey the setting for this new stage in my life: my own apartment, a basement pad complete with its own set of bills and responsibilities.

It's supposed to signal maturity, self-assurance and independence. Yet, right now, it represents just the opposite to me.

My mom jokes that it's like she's sent me to boot camp.

I vacuum three times a day for fear dust will attract bugs, and I'm only eating salad after a fiasco in the kitchen involving burned fries and rock-hard hamburgers. (Thankfully, you don't have to cook chocolate.) My dependable little car has been replaced by a 10-minute walk in sub-zero temperatures to a bus that's always crowded and never on time.

Instead of buying clothes at Club Monaco, I'm shopping for thumbtacks at Home Depot. Instead of eating at Miami Grill, I'm getting food from No Frills. Instead of painting the town red, I sit home wondering what colour to paint the walls so the place feels more like a warm, cozy place I'd like to live in.

Oops! Did I just call this apartment home?

It's not home, and I know that because of how homesick I've been since I moved out of my parents house a few weeks ago. Home is where I've rushed back to on nights when it's just too sad for me to be here alone. And home is not even in my old bedroom. It's in my mom's bed, right beside her, where I insisted on sleeping when I spent the night.

That's right, my apartment hasn't made me more mature. I'm actually less self-assured and more dependent than ever. I need to ask how to do everything, from cooking an eggplant to cleaning a carpet.

Most people move out of their parent's house to grow up. Me? I've regressed 10 years.

Nonetheless, although my mom calls every night offering to pick me up and return me to the comforts of my old life, I keep saying no. (It's a good thing she can't see how I nod my head yes.)

And even though I can't remember why I chose to move out, I know there must have been a reason.

At least I'm getting healthier with all the salads I'm eating and walking I'm doing. I'm also facing fears I didn't even know I had (my heart races each time I open the door to a furnace room where I keep my vacuum cleaner).

And for the first time, I appreciate how much effort it takes to make a house a home. My parents put so much love and care into our home growing up that it's no wonder my new place seems so cold.

My boss told me it took him 20 years to stop calling his parents' house home. A friend said it took her a month to stop crying.

But they both also said moving out was the most rewarding thing they ever did for themselves, and that if they could do it again, they wouldn't change a thing.

I've never liked taking the bus, but I've always been up for an experience, so I'm not giving up.

And as I sit on my couch and look around, I notice little things that I've done, almost subconsciously, to make my place feel more like home.

The colour scheme of my furniture is the same as in my parents' family room, and the food in my fridge is organized and prepared the way I remember it growing up.

And when I need to drown out the deafening silence, I just turn up the TV.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I feel really glum this time of year. Every December, the Christmas season is upon us. I can't do anything without being reminded of this holiday. It invades every part of my daily routine.

I can't walk through a mall without hearing Christmas music. I can't walk on the street without seeing Christmas lights. I can't turn on the radio without hearing Christmas songs. And every show on TV has a Christmas theme. The office is full of holiday treats and people are generally very happy.

As a Jew in Canada at Christmas, I can't help feeling left out. I like the idea of it – the gift-giving, the family, the lights. It's a warm holiday at a very cold time of year. I know it's a religious holiday, but it's become so commercialized that I hardly ever hear the religious aspect anymore. The point is, I feel guilty even thinking this way. I can't be the only one, can I?

Dear Feeling Left Out

Unless you're willing to move to Israel, you're stuck with this all-encompassing holiday season.

This time of year is a very lucrative period for most businesses. Therefore, the holiday is marketed very aggressively. The results are exactly what you describe.

Anywhere you turn, you can't get away from it. So what are you supposed to do? Nothing. Stop feeling guilty. There is nothing wrong with enjoying a beautifully decorated house. It's pretty. The shows on TV are still good, regardless of the theme, and the tunes are often very catchy. Unless you hibernate in your home and hide from outside stimuli, you can't avoid this season. Enjoying pretty lights doesn't make you a bad Jew.

Chanukah falls around the same time of year, so we can have the same feelings of gift-giving and family spirit through our very own holiday.

Lighting candles, family get-togethers, community programs, parties, latkes and Chanukah gifts and gelt will give you the warm spirit you are missing. Don't fight your way through this season. Live through it the Jewish way.

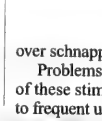
An urgent request

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



"Noah, the tiller of the soil, was the first to plant a vineyard. He drank of the wine and became drunk, and he uncovered himself within his tent." (Genesis, Chapter 9, verses 20 and 21).

According to some Jewish scholars, the beginning of the Book of Genesis provided our ancestors with explanations of how various parts of their world came to be. In the passage quoted above, we read an account of the beginning of viticulture and winemaking. Some other commentators use the passage, which alludes to acts of an immodest nature, as an opportunity to comment on the problems associated with alcohol.

Imbibing for pleasure has been part of society since the early days of creation, and the first sip of an intoxicant is often seen as a rite of passage into adulthood. And although it's still considered to be the bad brother, pot has become increasingly popular, and it's often preferred over schnapps by more and more of us.

Problems can arise, however, when the use of these stimulants evolves from moderation to frequent use, and when they act as stepping stones to a different, far more risky menu of drugs, especially among youth.

We all knew many young people who sipped leftover wine and scotch on the Shabbat kiddush table and got high on motza'ei Shabbat. It is, however, becoming painfully obvious to parents and community leaders that the occasional joint is often being replaced by dangerous drugs such as ecstasy, cocaine and heroine, and/or the daily downing of a 24-ounce bottle of booze.

Principals and teachers in both public and private schools will tell you privately that many of their students are regularly doing drugs. Rabbis know it, and so do parents.

So, unlike Immanuel Kant, the 18th-century philosopher who said Jews don't get drunk because their marginal position in society requires them to always be in control of themselves, we are no longer hiding (as much as we used to) from the reality that countless Jews are self-medicating in a serious way.

The question we need to address, however, is what are we doing for them, especially teens and young adults, even if they don't seem to want help?

Last week, I had a long discussion with a local Jewish mother about her son's excessive drug use, his deeply downhearted state and his lack of interest in getting help. This very scared mom said she has done her homework about how to help her son, and the answer she keeps hearing is, "In order to help, your son must want help."

So, the question I ask you, the reader, is: Have you gone through this hellish roller-coaster with your child, and if so, what have you done to help him or her? If you know of methods that worked, even when your child didn't reach out in an obvious manner, let me know. I will publish appropriate responses (anonymously) in my next column.

Please e-mail me at avrum@veahavta.org with any thoughts on people or organizations that are superlative in this area, or techniques you found that were helpful in returning your child to a safer place.

Depression, mental health problems and substance abuse are common among teens and people in their early 20s. It's an especially challenging age, and we need to hear cries for help even when tears are not flowing. We must embrace our young Jews who are lost in harmful highs and in pain – with love, creative solutions and purpose.

(Good news: JACS, a non-profit agency that helps substance abusers, recently launched the Benjy Hayward Teen Program, which sends volunteers into schools to hang out with, and distribute information on rehab programs to, students who are abusing drugs and alcohol. Chanukah Greetings

[Peter Kovachev]

Imagining Rashi

Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, Shlomo Yitzhaki, 1040 - 1105

Editorial

It is quite possible that the name Rashi, the beloved acronym for Rabbi Solomon (Shlomo) ben Isaac (Yitzhaki), is one of the very first names young Jewish students, wherever and whenever they have lived in the past 900 years, learn from their teachers. And once learned, his name has never been forgotten. Such has been the stature and the everlasting contribution to Jewish civilization of that great sage from Troyes.

Before calendar year 2005 gives way to 2006, The CJN is commemorating Rashi's 900th yahrzeit by devoting the pages of this Chanukah Greetings supplement to his life and teachings. We therefore commissioned a number of writers and scholars to help open, as it were, some of the pages of Rashi's book for us.

Martin Lockshin has written an introductory overview of Rashi's imprint on Judaism. Judith Shapero provides the reader with a sense of the exegetical context that Rashi inherited. Eric Lawee discusses Rashi's status in his and the subsequent scholarly Jewish world. Rabbi Shmuel Klitsner elaborates upon Rashi's methods of study, and Baruch Sienna, in effect, conducts a seminar on how to arrive at the question that Rashi doesn't always articulate.

Of course, there is some overlap among the essayists. But each cuts the multi-faceted Rashi crystal with new reflective light.

We even commissioned talented Toronto artist, Peter Kovachev, to imagine the way young Rashi might have looked. Kovachev also explains his reasoning in an accompanying article.

The CJN is also pleased to again publish the winning entries in the Canada Israel Experience Photo Contest. There is additional material in the supplement that we hope will enlighten, and perhaps too, delight our readers.

In the unknowable eternity of God's reach through time, 900 years of Rashi's scholarship has been barely a whisper in the wind. But in the mystery-laden history of the Jewish people, his voice has been a constant echo of all the voices that have called us to our Book, our traditions and our purposes in life.

And this brings us to the chief debt we owe our essayists. In helping us to know Rashi better, they help us to know ourselves better. In providing more insight into Rashi, they also enable us to have more insight into ourselves, into who we are, into who and what we must still be. As we prepare to light the candles of Chanukah, these are appropriate thoughts.

We acknowledge a special debt to Martin Lockshin for his advice, assistance and guidance in helping us with the supplement.

Chag urim samayach.

Imagining Rashi

By PETER KOVACHEV

When the editor asked me to imagine and depict a portrait of Rashi for this feature, I was a little concerned. We have no idea what Rashi looked like, as there are no known descriptions or depictions of the great rabbi and scholar. Portraiture was rare in late 11th-century France, and the few examples we have from the period are highly stylized, almost cartoonish, illuminations of a few kings and noblemen.

Nor did I have useful examples of other imagined treatments to go by. The most common imagined portrait of Rashi we are likely to come across in books and stamps is an anonymous depiction, probably from the 19th century. In it we see a frail-looking, hunched-over, white-bearded man in a sloppy, oversized turban who looks to be about 100 years old. Another depiction has him a little younger, and again in the de rigueur white beard, but this time dressed in what looks like a serf's costume hacked out of sackcloth with a dull knife.

'A man who lived in the mainstream of a dynamic age'

I decided that I had to look elsewhere – not in the world of images, but in the biographies and descriptions of Rashi's times and place.

So, we know that Rashi was a native of the city of Troyes, an important market town, a trade hub in France's Champagne province. We know too that he was an involved family man, a busy scholar and teacher, a judge, a vintner and someone who dealt regularly with the leaders of his community, with his Christian neighbours and with some of the most interesting political personalities of his times. This told me quite a bit, and so I began to imagine him in the prime of his life as a fit, energetic, expressive and personable man in the centre of a cheerful and well-appointed household. I could almost hear the sounds of the Andalusian lute in the background, and smell the lingering scent of rose water and exotically spiced dishes.

From what we know about French Jewish life of the High Middle Ages, it is very likely that Rashi would have dressed elegantly, in the common style of the middle-class townsman. In his city of Troyes, where two important trade routes – to the Near East and to the wealthy Italian city states – intersected, he would have found excellent tailors, not to mention the best fabrics to be found in Europe.

There were fitted and layered tunics with flowing sleeves, tailored hose of finest linen, fancy hoods and skillfully wrapped turbans. From the Orient and from across the Pyrenees came embroidered and woodblock-printed silks, thick velvets, damasks, and brocades in bright hues and intricate arabesque weaves.

Perhaps, as a scholar, Rashi would have leaned towards the sober rather than the flamboyant, avoiding clashing colours and too much fur and jewelry. We don't know of course, but what went for sober in an age when fashions leaned towards the Orient was a far cry from the poorly dyed and roughly tailored garb of his northern European contemporaries or the modest and monochromatic costume of the 18th-century shtetl.

Frankly, I hoped that my imagined portrait of Rashi as a young and cheerful man, clad in fine silks and with a costly Persian wall tapestry in the background, would be somewhat iconoclastic. I saw no point in trying to hold on to the established and most likely inaccurate visual stereotype of him as a frail and unapproachable scholar in a far away land and a distant time, a pale recluse scribbling away in a musty study.

If a picture is said to be worth a thousand words, then it should generate at least a few of them that properly describe a man who lived in the mainstream of a dynamic age and who lived life to the fullest: a brilliant and prolific intellectual, a wise judge, a hard-working businessman, a respected community leader, a loving parent, and to indulge in an understatement, a good Jew.

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

When I teach a Jewish history course, I often begin by checking the students' level of knowledge. One of my favourite – and, for me, most depressing – exercises is to ask each of the students to write down the names of three Jews who lived after biblical times but before 1800.

Sadly, only a minority of students can come up with three such names. When they can, not surprisingly the two names that appear most often are those of Moses Maimonides (1135 or 1138-1204) and Rashi (Solomon ben Isaac, 1040-1105), probably the two post-biblical Jews who have had the greatest enduring effect on the history of Judaism.

Last year, we commemorated the 800th anniversary of the passing of Maimonides; this year we commemorate the 900th anniversary of Rashi's. This supplement examines Rashi's contributions to Judaism.

It's easy enough to describe to the non-expert how great Maimonides' contributions were. He revolutionized the field of Jewish law with the first comprehensive organized code of law. He also revolutionized the field of Jewish philosophy with a controversial work, the Guide of the Perplexed, which had wide effect on philosophers both inside and outside of Judaism. His innovative teachings aroused an unprecedented level of opposition in rabbinical circles. (It is hard to be innovative and to work outside the box without arousing ire from the unimaginative.)

It is difficult to describe to the non-expert what precisely Rashi's impact was. First of all, unlike Maimonides, Rashi never elicited much opposition. In this supplement, Eric Lawee describes how even in Spain, a different world in many ways from Rashi's home in northern France, Rashi achieved near iconic status soon after his death. The true greatness of Rashi's accomplishments is that he became so universally beloved so quickly, and retained his venerated status even into the 21st century.

'He established a familial dynasty of Torah scholars, not a common pattern, then or now'

How did Rashi leave his imprint on the last 900 years of Judaism without stirring up the opposition that Maimonides did? What kind of person was Rashi? Is his personality reflected in his works?

Biography and autobiography were not well-developed literary genres in pre-modern Jewish circles. More often than not, the meagre biographical information that we have about important rabbinic figures can best be called generic hagiography or Jewish "lives of the saints." In the standard folk literature, we find that each of the great rabbis was a child prodigy, had a photographic memory, was renowned for living a life of deprivation, regularly lobbied the gentile authorities on behalf of the Jewish community, rarely slept and was always cheerful. Even if we assume that all of these characteristics are found in all of the great rabbis of pre-modern times, such descriptions do nothing to help us understand the personality of any individual rabbi.

Even the one unique and widely believed "fact" about Rashi's life that I was taught as a child – that Rashi produced and sold wine to make a living – appears, according to recent historians, to have no basis. It's true that Rashi lived in the Champagne district of France and it's also true that he knew a lot about wine making. Jews in those days generally made their own wine, but not everyone who knows how to bake bread sells bread for a living, and not everyone who knows how to make wine makes enough wine to sell it for a living. One of the leading historians of medieval Judaism, Haym Soloveichik, (in "Can Halakhic Texts Talk History?") doubts that the soil around Troyes – Rashi's hometown – was rich enough to allow the production of enough grapes to make more wine than needed for home consumption. Soloveichik examines the "evidence" that Rashi was in the wine business, and concludes: "Rashi may nevertheless have been a vintner, but by the same measure he may have been an egg salesman." Soloveichik argues further that extreme caution has to be used when reconstructing someone's life or character from their religious writings.

So what do we know of Rashi? For one thing, he established a familial dynasty of Torah scholars, not a common pattern then or now. Rashi had no sons, but it is clear that his daughters had some involvement in his scholarly activities. This supplement includes a creative piece of historical fiction by Maggie Anton, describing Rashi and his nuclear family. His grandsons Samuel and Jacob ben Meir, his son-in-law Judah ben Natan and his great-grandson Isaac of Dampierre, are the most famous names among his descendant-disciples, but there were many more.

Like many of his contemporaries, Rashi wrote mostly commentaries. Yet his commentaries, both biblical and talmudic, eclipsed all previous commentaries and have never been superseded. In this supplement, Judith Shapero discusses the early history of Bible commentaries, Rabbi Shmuel Klitsner analyzes some aspects of Rashi's interpretive method and Baruch Sienna discusses how Rashi's works have lived and remain relevant to our day.

Two aspects of Rashi's character stand out when I examine his interpretive works. First of all, Rashi, as opposed to almost all of the other great Jewish Bible commentators, often admits when he does not know how to interpret a specific verse or phrase. (See, for example, his commentary to Genesis 35:13, Exodus 22:28, Numbers 26:16, Deuteronomy 33:24, Isaiah 23:15 and Psalms 83:11.) You virtually never find such admissions in the commentaries of Rashbam, ibn Ezra and Ramban – Rashi's page-mates in standard printed editions of rabbinic Bibles –although presumably they all had their doubts from time to time.

'He rarely disparages the works of others'

Rashi also stands apart from other Bible and Talmud commentators in that he rarely disparages the works of others. His commentaries are essentially free of the kind of insults that we find in Rashbam: "Those who interpret these verses as referring to other matters are totally wrong" (commentary to Exodus 3:11); in ibn Ezra: "He who interpreted… and brought proof from his own daughter's behaviour interpreted foolishly" (commentary to Genesis 38:15); and in Ramban: "The intention of the classical rabbis wasn't at all what Rashi claimed [it to be]" (commentary to Exodus 24:1). Much of commentary literature appears to be unnecessarily filled with nasty insults, but not the commentaries of Rashi.

But Rashi does occasionally get angry. In a fascinating legal opinion written in answer to a query posed to him in Jewish law (a responsum) Rashi writes about a husband who was trying to annul his marriage (i.e. to terminate it without making any support payments), claiming that he had been misled since his wife's family history of physical defects had been withheld from him when he entered the marriage. Rashi makes it clear that the husband is not behaving as a Jew should. "Had he spent as much time trying to build his relationship with her as he spent trying to push her away, he would certainly have come to love her," says Rashi. Rashi expresses his disgust with the behaviour of this man. Prudently, though, he suggests that if the man is unwilling to behave lovingly and respectfully toward his wife, he ought to divorce her and make all the required support payments. (Rashi's responsa, number 207. The full text of this responsum may be found in English translation in Jacob Marcus' The Jew in the Medieval World, 1999). Rashi, then, was willing to use harsh language when it was called for, but not to disparage the works of his fellow scholars.

Scholars debate about the extent to which the zeitgeist and current events influenced Rashi's writings and his approach to questions of interpretation and of law. Many try to identify anti-Christian polemics as a central theme in Rashi's works. Lately, though, scholars such as Shaye Cohen, of Harvard University, and Daniel Lasker, of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, have begun to question just how central that issue was for Rashi. Rashi, to be sure, was not kindly disposed to Christianity. But in his works we occasionally see some surprising glimpses of neighbourly relations between Christians and Jews in northern France. One of Rashi's responsa (number 144) centres around the question of what to do with a food gift basket that he received from a Christian neighbour on a Jewish holy day. The overt legal issue discussed in the answer is whether a Jew may benefit from a gift that was delivered on the holiday. But the social reality reflected in the question – that Rashi's Christians neighbours sent him gifts on Jewish holidays – opens up a surprising window on Rashi's world.

'A Jew is always a Jew'

The most dramatic historical event of Rashi's lifetime was the first Crusade, which took place in 1096, nine years before he died. While the Jewish communities of northern France were spared the worst ravages of the Crusaders, the neighbouring Jewish communities of Germany suffered tragic losses. The Jews of France and Germany generally saw themselves as one community; the German catastrophes were keenly felt in France. For Rashi, who had spent many years studying in Germany, it must have been a horrifying experience to learn of the near total destruction of the communities that had hosted him in his student days.

Again scholars disagree about the extent to which we can find reactions to the Crusades in Rashi's commentaries. A common theory is that Rashi's first comment on the first verse of the Torah – a comment where he highlights the Jewish claim to the land of Israel – might be best understood in light of the Crusades. As Christians and Muslims fought to the death about control of the land, Rashi, so the argument goes, felt the need to emphasize the superiority of the Jewish claim. Yet this theory is not very convincing since Rashi probably wrote his Torah commentary earlier than 1096.

But the Crusades do play a significant role in the responsa written by Rashi. Many of the questions submitted to Rashi revolve around of the status of Jews who converted to Christianity during the terrible events connected with the Crusades. There we can see Rashi's greatness as a creative and compassionate leader of the Jewish community.

The late historian Jacob Katz, in Exclusiveness and Tolerance, was the first to explain the innovative nature of Rashi's approach to apostasy during the Crusades. Rashi was the first to argue that a Jew is always a Jew, no matter what he or she has done. "Yisrael af al pi she-hata yisrael hu – an Israelite even if he or she has sinned is still an Israelite," taught Rashi. The teaching appears to be nothing new since the line, Af al pi she-hata yisrael hu, is actually talmudic in origin. But in the Talmud (Sanhedrin 44a) it means, "Even if the Jewish people has sinned, it is still the Jewish people." By subtly shifting the meaning of the Hebrew word Yisrael from meaning "the Jewish people" to meaning "the individual Jew," Rashi introduced to Judaism the teaching that not only is it the case that sin does not diminish the status of the Jewish people as Jews, but sin also does not diminish the status of any individual Jew as a Jew. This approach was certainly compassionate at the end of the late 11th century when many Jews became Christians out of fear for their lives and were looking for opportunities to return to the fold whenever it became possible. Rashi taught them that they had never stopped being Jews. (See Rashi's responsa, numbers 171, 173, 175 and 246, for example.)

Our knowledge of antiquity, of Semitic languages and of literary theory may have advanced greatly in the 900 years since Rashi died. So there are many good reasons for the student who wants to understand the Bible to turn to more recent Bible commentaries. But we are unlikely to find better teachers and role models than the great sage of Troyes, Rashi.

Early history of commentators

By JUDITH SHAPERO

Did biblical interpretation begin with Rashi? What happened to the efforts of Jews to interpret the Hebrew Bible before Rashi? What influence did earlier works have on him?

Biblical interpretation was a thriving Jewish enterprise before Rashi entered the scene. Still, it is clear that few before Rashi had the profound impact on biblical interpretation that he did, and his work quickly overshadowed much of the work of those who came before him.

The process of biblical interpretation actually began within the Bible itself. Certain books or sections of the Bible can be seen as interpretations of earlier ones. For example, the book of Chronicles offers a new perspective on the events described in the books of Samuel and Kings.

The idea of biblical interpretation – that is, of studying and trying to understand the holy text — is described in the book of Nehemiah. The Jewish people returned to Zion after the Babylonian exile and were engaged in a covenant renewal with God.

A major feature of the renewal ceremony was the reading aloud of the Torah. Nehemiah 8:8 states: "And they read from the scroll of the Teaching of God, explaining it and giving the sense; so they understood the reading." It was not enough to read the Torah aloud. The process of understanding was not yet complete. First the holy text must be explained and interpreted in order to have it be relevant and meaningful for the people.

This text shows that 2,500 years ago, Jews were already involved in biblical exegesis, which continued to be a dominant form of Jewish religious expression throughout the ages.

So Rashi was hardly the first Jewish Bible exegete. Before he wrote his famous commentary, Jews had already developed a number of different ways of writing works of Bible interpretation, including rabbinic-style midrash, emerging grammatical analysis, and rational exegesis coming from the Muslim Jewish world. How much influence did those works have on Rashi?

Rashi was immersed in the culture of rabbinic midrash and drew heavily upon works from that school when composing his own Bible commentaries. But the midrashim that he cited quickly became the dominant understanding of a particular biblical verse or phrase. Students would often study the Bible by putting one finger on the biblical verse and one finger on Rashi's comments for that verse and would read both simultaneously.

Rashi's comments became so ingrained in the minds of students of Torah that they often could not distinguish between what they read in the Torah and what they read in Rashi. The popularity of the midrashim that Rashi did not include in his commentary – and the corpus was huge – paled in comparison.

In Rashi's time, there were many popular midrashic collections and biblical commentators that drew upon rabbinic midrash. Rashi did not quote from midrash indiscriminately, however, but worked into his commentary only those midrashim that supported his exegetical aims.

In his commentary to Genesis 3:8, Rashi offers a rare glimpse into his relationship with the other popular midrashic collections. "There are many midrashic explanations, and our teachers have already collected them in their appropriate places in Bereshit Rabba and in other midrashim."

Rashi acknowledges the collections but then distinguishes his enterprise from theirs. "I, however, am only concerned with the grammatical-contextual sense of Scripture (peshuto shel miqra) and with such aggadot that explain the words of Scripture in a manner that settles well with them."

In this statement, Rashi distinguishes between two main categories of biblical interpretation – pshat and drash. Drash is the traditional rabbinic method of interpretation. Based on the root meaning "to seek," interpretations based on drash offer creative explanations of individual elements within a text, focusing on the religious meaning of the text rather than on context. The midrashic (from the same root as drash) collections use this method of interpretation to come up with a myriad of imaginative and religiously meaningful interpretations.

Rashi sees no need to offer simply another collection of midrashim. Rather, he incorporates only those midrashim that settle well with the context of the verse and solve a difficulty in the text. Furthermore, he introduces the novel element of grammatical analysis that forms the backbone of many of his interpretations.

This focus on grammar and lexicography was a crucial element in his biblical exegesis.

The scientific study of the Hebrew language originated with the Jews living under Muslim rule, particularly in Spain; so it was not directly part of Rashi's world. It paralleled the rise of the study of Arabic among Muslims.

In the early middle ages, Jews under Islam absorbed the dominant surrounding culture more than the Jews who lived under Christianity did, and there was a very high level of cultural symbiosis. The Jews under Islam, like their gentile neighbours, were involved in both religious and secular intellectual pursuits.

Muslims believed that the literary and linguistic excellence of the Arabic language used in the Qur'an was proof of the perfection of Islam itself. This spurred Jews to praise the special qualities of the Hebrew language. Muslim pride in the Arabic language led to the grammatical study of their holy language and stimulated Jews to do the same. Jews embarked upon the scientific investigation into Hebrew grammar and philology that in turn helped Jews understand the Hebrew Bible in innovative ways.

Created original hybrid form of commentary

The same linguistic enterprise was not to be found among Jews living under Christianity. French Jewish scholars did not at that time create original works on Hebrew grammar. The Jews living under Christianity were further hampered by the fact that several key early works on Hebrew grammar, composed in Spain, were written in Arabic.

The Jews living under Christianity had no facility with the Arabic language and thus were dependent upon translations of the works into Hebrew. Those translations did not arrive in France until after Rashi's death. However, two path-breaking grammatical works were written in Hebrew and made their way to the Jews living under Christian rule in time for Rashi to have known and used them.

The two 10th-century Spanish grammarians whose works most influenced Rashi's were Menahem ibn Saruq and Dunash ibn Labrat. Menahem ibn Saruq compiled the first Hebrew-language dictionary, a lexicon of the Bible. His dictionary, called the Mahberet, established the idea that the Hebrew language was governed by a fixed set of rules and could be explained in a systematic manner. Dunash ibn Labrat was a younger contemporary who engaged in a heated dispute with Menahem on several specific grammatical and theological points. In his work criticizing the Mahberet, Dunash made his own worthwhile contributions to the emerging field of Hebrew grammar. Both these author's works were known to Rashi, and he incorporated their grammatical discoveries into his own innovative analysis of the biblical texts.

We therefore can say that even though Rashi's Bible commentary has dominated Judaism for the last 900 years, he was by no means the first Jew to write in this genre.

He may have been the father of pshat interpretation among exegetes living in the Christian world. But this interpretive enterprise actually originated with the Jews living among the Muslims.

Those Jews had access to Muslim culture because of the shared language of Arabic and a shared intellectual outlook. Those exegetes incorporated not only the Muslim world's emphasis on linguistics, but also its renaissance of rationalism and philosophy. However, due to linguistic, geographical and cultural barriers, most of these works did not have a direct impact on Rashi's interpretations.

Rashi created his own original hybrid form of commentary, judiciously utilizing some of the rich corpus of midrashic exegesis that preceded him, combining it with those contemporary grammatical insights to which he had access, and forging a bold new direction of biblical interpretation that continues to resonate into modern times.

Rashi in Spain: the case of the Torah commentary

By ERIC LAWEE

In Jewish legend, Rashi travels to places far and wide in the Jewish world, including Egypt, where one chronologically impossible tale has him spending "many days" in the home of Maimonides.

By contrast, historians know of no occasion on which Rashi ventured beyond what medieval Jews came over time to call "Ashkenaz," a designation that initially referred to the German Jewish settlements in which Rashi studied but eventually also encompassed his native northern France, where Rashi achieved his stature as Ashkenazi Jewry's most famous medieval figure.

If Rashi remained within the orbit of Ashkenaz, things were otherwise with his two major works, the commentary on the Torah and commentary on the Talmud. These masterpieces of Jewish learning travelled from their northern French home to the four corners of the Jewish world, slowly gaining the status that they still enjoy as "the classic commentaries on the two classics of Judaism." (This is the brilliant formulation of my teacher of blessed memory, Yitzhak Twersky, who used it to convey something of Rashi's towering significance to Harvard undergraduates.)

Works were immediately studied and sifted, adopted and adapted by Sephardi Jewry

When Rashi's works arrived in the Jewish communities of Iberia, or "Sefarad" as it was called in medieval Hebrew, they were immediately studied and sifted, adopted and adapted, and, by turns, admired or rejected, by Sephardi Jewry's leading scholars. The Spanish rabbis who read Rashi were, however, shaped by traditions of Jewish and general learning and a larger cultural milieu very different from the Ashkenazi heritage that moulded Rashi's religious outlook and ideas. This being so, Rashi's arrival in Spain marks one in a long list of encounters between Ashkenazi learning and literature and its Sephardi counterpart – encounters that, in some ways, continue to shape alternatives in Jewish life and thought down to this day. Snapshots of this encounter as it played out in the Sephardi reception of Rashi's Torah commentary follow. Before turning to them, however, a few words are in order about the Spanish fate of Rashi's Talmud commentary.

Talmud commentary: indispensable aid

Rashi's Talmud commentary was ushered into the precincts of Sephardi scholarship around the turn of the 13th century by Meir Halevi Abulafia (Ramah), the pre-eminent Spanish talmudist of his day. At the time, not all of this work was available at local Jewish bookstores. In one of his few surviving letters, Ramah enjoins a friend travelling to northern Spain to acquire for him Rashi's commentaries to several talmudic tractates. With the arrival of Rashi's commentaries in Spain, Sephardi Halachah would, for the first time, open itself to the achievements of northern European rabbinic learning.

Rashi's Talmud commentary quickly achieved a central place in Spanish rabbinic literature. A century and a half after Ramah, Isaac bar Sheshet (Rivash) extolled "the great luminary, our master Solomon (the memory of the righteous be for a blessing), who uncovered the Talmud's darkest depths." Indeed, opined this premier 14th-century halachist, were it not for Rashi, the ways of the Babylonian Talmud "would have been forgotten from Israel" entirely.

Rivash's Castilian contemporary, Menahem ben Zerah, agreed. He also suggested that the "holy spirit" had rested on Rashi as he composed his talmudic expositions. Even if this ascription of semi-prophetic talmudic insight to Rashi was intended only figuratively, as seems likely, it speaks volumes about the esteem in which the Talmud commentary was held in Spain within a century and a half of its arrival there.

Torah commentary: first encounters

Sephardi tradition first crossed paths with Rashi's Torah commentary in the early 12th century when a leading Bible scholar, Abraham ibn Ezra, departed Muslim Spain ("al-Andalus") for a life of itinerant scholarship in Christian Europe. While sojourning in Italy, France and England, ibn Ezra encountered Rashi's biblical scholarship and its goal of relaying the Bible's "plain" or "contextual" meaning (peshuto shel miqra). While endorsing the aim, ibn Ezra issued a rather severe verdict on Rashi's realization of it. In his judgment, Rashi had succeeded in uncovering scriptural peshat only "one time in a thousand." Not all Sephardi scholars shared this view.

The 14th-century Saragossan Torah commentator, Bahya ben Asher, seeking a model for the "contextual method" of scriptural interpretation at its best, found it in the commentaries of "the great luminary," Rashi.

Bahya's teacher, Moses ben Nahman (Ramban), the most influential Jewish biblical interpreter to emerge from Spain, also gave Rashi's Torah commentary a respectful hearing, even as he took issue with many of its specific findings. In an introductory poem to his own Torah commentary, Ramban conceded Rashi's place as the "first-born" among commentators and announced his intention to be "infatuated with the love of Rashi's words." Of course, a person aware of his infatuation with another can guard against the weakened powers of critical judgment that infatuation usually entails. So it was with Ramban. While engaging Rashi regularly, thereby doing much to enshrine Rashi's Torah commentary as a pivot of later Jewish Bible study, Ramban disputed, without a smidgen of apology, numerous interpretations of Rashi, including – and perhaps especially – ones grounded in rabbinic midrash.

An example is Rashi's reading of the dramatic scene depicting Jacob's and Joseph's reunification after many years of separation. Explaining the Torah's ambiguous description of one of the two crying on the other's neck, Rashi, on midrashic authority, proposed that Joseph had wept on his father's neck while his father's thoughts were directed elsewhere, as Jacob was just then in the middle of reciting the Shema. By contrast, Ramban found this reconstruction psychologically implausible. Who, he asked, was more likely to burst into tears in such a situation, "the aged parent who finds his son alive after despairing of his return and mourning him or the young son now ruling [the whole of Egypt]?"

In the later Middle Ages, Spanish scholars focused on Torah commentaries

Education, Halachah, ordinary bookshelves

Naturally, the Torah commentary was not read only by scholars. Though scant, some later medieval evidence suggests it was the companion of Jewish children in Spain as they inaugurated their careers of Torah study. More certain is the special status conferred on the commentary in another sphere of Torah learning.

Building on an idea stated by his father Asher ben Yehiel (Rosh), Jacob ben Asher ruled in his legal code (Arba'ah Turim) written in Spain in the first half of the 14th century that Rashi's commentary could be used to meet the second part of the twofold talmudic obligation to review the weekly Torah portion twice in Hebrew and once in interpretive paraphrase (targum). As, however, the rulings in this code often reflected Ashkenazi traditions imported from Germany to Spain by Jacob's father, this halachic innovation does not clinch the case for Rashi's central role in daily Hispano-Jewish religious life.

More revealing are data in a very different source, a record of the contents of 26 representative – as opposed to scholarly Spanish Jewish libraries confiscated by Christian authorities at the beginning of the 15th century. In it, references to Rashi's "glosses on the Law [i.e., Torah]" ("glosa de rabi Salamon de la Ley") are conspicuously plentiful. By the late Middle Ages, then, it would seem that the Torah commentary was on many an ordinary Spanish Jewish bookshelf.

Inspired work

The most exalted image of Rashi to emerge from the Middle Ages – and perhaps from any period in Jewish history – was one projected by an anonymous kabbalist living in Castile on the eve of the Spanish Expulsion of 1492. This mystic admonished his readers not to think even "for a moment" that Rashi's talmudic or biblical commentaries were the product of human industry (in the kabbalist's words, one should not think that Rashi composed his commentaries "from his head"). Rather, Rashi's writings should be seen as reflections of a revelation bestowed upon this northern French sage through the mystical "secret of the garment," a medium of illumination enjoyed by such earlier greats of Jewish tradition as Shimon bar Yohai and the Mishnah's redactor, Yehudah Hanasi. Indeed, awareness of this truth explained why "all the sages of Israel believed in Rashi." In asserting the quasi-prophetic status of Rashi's biblical commentaries, the Castilian kabbalist anticipated a claim made more frequently in centuries to come – a claim that, in some circles, is still voiced today.

Commentaries on the commentary

In the later Middle Ages, a number of Spanish scholars, including heads of Spain's foremost rabbinic academies, initiated a genre of Jewish literature in which, instead of explaining the Torah directly, Rashi's Torah commentary, became the focus of exegetical attention. Nowadays, this characteristically Jewish activity of commenting on a commentary – or, in some cases, commenting on a commentary on a commentary! – is designated by the term "supercommentary."

In writing systematic "Rashi supercommentaries," Spanish scholars launched a field that would attract some of Judaism's most famous rabbinic minds (e.g., in the 16th century, Judah Loew ben Bezalel, the famous Maharal of Prague). The field has since come to boast offerings in the dozens by the most conservative estimates and the hundreds by more elastic ones. It is still expanding, as attested by several recent English-language offerings, including one whose title captures a common goal of Rashi supercommentators: to discover the textual difficulty or narrative nuance that spurred Rashi's explanation of a given passage (see Avigdor Bonchek's What's Bothering Rashi?). Since almost all of the Spanish supercommentary literature on Rashi remains in manuscript, it seems appropriate to conclude this survey of the Torah commentary's fate in Spain by airing, however fleetingly, the sorts of insights with which this literature is replete. Our sample is drawn from one of the most thorough and comprehensive of the Sephardi supercommentaries, composed by the Spanish emigré scholar Moses ibn Gabbai.

A leading talmudist, ibn Gabbai wrote his supercommentary on Rashi in North Africa after fleeing devastating anti-Jewish riots that swept through Spain in 1391, leaving many Jews dead and thousands more as forcibly baptized Christians, or Conversos. Ibn Gabbai reveals his supreme admiration for Rashi when, in his work's introduction, he calls Rashi a "master," "eminence," "father of Israel" – nay, "angel of the Lord." In the body of his work, he frequently undertakes what is a characteristic activity of supercommentators: the resolution of apparent contradictions in disparate parts of the work upon which they are commenting.

One case arose from Rashi's comments on Genesis 47:28. The verse, which begins a new weekly Torah portion, describes Jacob's activities prior to his impending death. Rashi sought to explain an element of the Torah's graphic layout at the point at which the verse occurs: why is the beginning of this new Torah portion "closed"? (That is, why, uniquely in the Torah, is there no intervening space between the portions of Va-Yiggash and Va-Yechi?) According to one of Rashi's suggestions, the missing gap reflected the psychological state of the Israelites due to disturbing events on the ground: "the eyes and hearts of Israel were closed because of the affliction of the bondage with which the Egyptians began to afflict them."

Rashi won the hearts and minds of the Jews of Sefarad

But, notes Moses ibn Gabbai, this comment presents a problem: does not Rashi say elsewhere in his commentary (see the comment on Exodus 6:16) that the Egyptian enslavement began only after the death of Levi, the last of Jacob's sons to remain alive? Ibn Gabbai's answer will resonate with any contemporary Jew: even where formal government-backed anti-Jewish oppression is absent, fledgling "grassroots anti-Semitism" (to paraphrase ibn Gabbai slightly) can flourish. That is what happened toward the end of Jacob's lifetime, opines ibn Gabbai, and though Joseph retained his high station in Egypt, his power was ebbing such that he was unable to impede this ominous development.

As Jewish slavery was in its incipient stages already in Va-Yechi – in the form of bouts of sporadic "anti-Semitic" activity practised by individual Egyptians – there was a closure in the "eyes and hearts" of the Israelites; hence, the unique "closure" between weekly Torah portions at this point in the text. By contrast, Rashi's later comment alluded to a full-blown, government-sponsored campaign of oppression against the B'nei Yisrael set in place only after Levi's death.

One wonders whether this ingenious solution to Rashi's apparently contradictory comments on Genesis 47:28 and Exodus 6:16 bears autobiographical overtones. As a victim of the 1391 pogroms, ibn Gabbai knew that the Spanish political and ecclesiastical elites were largely taken by surprise when segments of Spain's Christian population fomented the attacks that saw much of Spanish Jewry murdered or dragged off to the baptismal font. If ibn Gabbai's explanation of Rashi in this instance owed something to his own experience, then it would be but one of many instances where Rashi's Spanish interpreters read the Torah commentary through the lens of their distinctively Sephardi concerns or circumstances.

For nine centuries, Rashi's Torah commentary has guided Jews of all ages and levels of learning as they pondered the Torah and sought to fathom its meaning. Indeed, over time, the commentary was "absorbed into the bloodstream of Jewish culture" (to quote the vivid image of contemporary Torah scholar Avivah Zornberg). Strange it is, then, that the story of the Torah commentary's rise to pre-eminence has yet to be told. When it is, one riveting chapter will have to explain how this monument of Jewish scholarship and sensibilities composed by a great son of Ashkenaz won the hearts and minds of the Jews of Sefarad.

A key text for millions

By RABBI SHMUEL KLITSNER

Over the nine hundred years since his death, Rashi's commentary on the five books of Moses has achieved centrality of mythic proportions for the curriculum of Jewish study.

One of the most remarkable aspects of its popularity has been its adaptability as a key text for daily or weekly study for millions of Jews aged five to 95. It is printed in all of the traditional rabbinic Bibles and it has become the departure point for all subsequent Jewish biblical commentary. Among the thousands of Jewish biblical commentaries, what is the powerful secret of Rashi's durability and magnetism?

Takes aim at the 'plain meaning' or peshat of the biblical verse

Though Rashi did not begin his commentary on the Torah with an introductory statement of methodology, he did state his agenda in clear terms in his comments to Genesis 3:8: "There are many homiletic commentaries... but I have come only to [provide] the plain meaning of scripture and also those homilies that resolve matters of scripture in a manner that accords with the wording."

On the one hand, Rashi takes aim at the "plain meaning" or peshat of the biblical verse; on the other hand, when there is difficult wording that requires resolution, he will also resort to homilies or derash that address the textual issues at stake. One might put it thus: Rashi employs the method of a plain-meaning interpretive stance. But when such a method fails to resolve all the textual difficulties that confront the reader, Rashi still feels an obligation to highlight the difficulty of the elusive plain reading and will not hesitate to address the problems presented by the plain-reading approach in a very unplain or midrashic mode.

I recently heard a Rashi joke that went something like this: Rabbi and Mrs. Rashi are about to go out to dinner (apparently to enjoy fine 11th-century French cuisine). Rashi turns to his wife and asks: "Dear, do you really want to wear the blue scarf?" Mrs. Rashi (irritated): "Rashi, must you comment on everything?"

Yet, in fact, he decidedly does not comment on everything. The question of which verses and words attract Rashi's attention and why – has been the subject of scholarly conjecture for centuries.

Often, in the seemingly most prosaic and easily read verses, Rashi seems to be troubled by a curious aspect to the text that would have eluded most readers. What makes Rashi's comments both intriguing and challenging is the fact that more often than not, Rashi addresses a textual difficulty and resolves it without clearly identifying the difficulty to begin with. Hence, most advanced rabbinic lessons involving biblical commentary begin with the question: "What is troubling Rashi?"

The master has given us an answer, but to what question?

Many of the great Rashi scholars of the past – there are hundreds of published commentaries on Rashi's commentary – have maintained that in each of Rashi's comments to a biblical verse, he is responding to a textual anomaly, an ambiguity, an ungrammatical form, an unusual word choice or an ellipsis. To read Rashi attentively is to become sensitive to the oddities, seeming redundancies, contradictions, non sequiturs and syntactical deviations from the norm that riddle biblical text and often make it into riddle.

The late Canadian thinker Marshall McLuhan wrote about what he called hot media and cool media. Hot media bombard the recipient with much sensory and cognitive data and leave him or her largely passive in the otherwise participatory act of communication. By contrast, the cool medium provides much stimulation but incomplete information and tends to invite greater participation on the part of the recipient. Thus, a photograph might be described as hot as compared to an impressionistic painting; a poem cooler than a phone book.

Using McLuhan's terminology, the Hebrew Bible is a quintessentially cool medium. It conveys its messages and ideas and evokes its emotional responses in an economy of language that invites – nay necessitates – the reader's active participation. It invites multiple interpretation and endless exploration of its pregnant meanings. When commentaries enter the fray, they can either cut off discussion or foster it. Rashi, intuitively or consciously, found a way of clarifying the text on the one hand, while stimulating – in fact, necessitating – further study at the same time. He responded to a cool medium by appropriately creating another cool medium. One of the ways he did this was by often not identifying the very difficulty he was calling attention to.

The result is that Rashi forces one to take a closer, second look at the biblical text to find the rough edges of the text that point to subtexts, and Rashi's own commentary becomes another text for further question and answer – like participatory study.

Many volumes of scholarly works have detailed and illustrated the process we have described, but we will have to suffice with two examples.

Highlighted unusual biblical literary phenomena

In Genesis 18:1, the verse describes God appearing to Abraham "as he sat at the opening of the tent in the heat of the day." Rashi quotes the Talmud (Bava Metzia 86b) as explaining the purpose of God's visitation: "to visit the sick… it was the third day after his [Abraham's] circumcision and the Holy One Blessed Be He came to wish him well."

At first glance, this comment was intended to connect the previous chapter's ending – the circumcision of Abraham and Ishmael – to the beginning of this chapter – God appearing to Abraham. Yet upon further reflection, taking into account the presumption that Rashi is almost always reacting to a textual anomaly or abnormality, it would appear that Rashi is, in fact, highlighting for the reader a unique feature of this text that otherwise may have escaped our notice.

The phrase, "And the Lord appeared to…" is deployed throughout the Bible as the standard coinage for introducing a divine-human communication. Invariably, what follows this phrase is the content of a verbal or visual message from God. Yet here in Genesis 18:1, no such message seems to follow as the text moves immediately and abruptly to Abraham greeting the three unexpected passersby.

Rashi's main contribution here, as in many other verses, is the highlighting of an unusual biblical literary phenomenon that otherwise may have eluded our attention.

Seen in this light, Rashi's comment about God coming to visit the ailing Abraham reflects a striking nuance in the biblical text's portrayal of God's relationship with Abraham. Whereas other prophetic moments are about the conveying of content or message, this "God appeared to Abraham" is about intimacy – about the relationship itself.

My revered teacher, the late Nechama Leibowitz, used to drive home this nuance to her students by saying that she was always glad when a student would call or visit to ask about a difficult verse or a difficult Rashi – but when a student came calling just to look in on her, it was an entirely different source of satisfaction. For Leibowitz, God coming to "visit the sick" is Rashi's way of saying that this anomalous revelation without message content is to be seen as an expression of God's unique relationship with the prophet.

Rashi's grandson, the great exegete Rashbam, solves the textual difficulty otherwise, by suggesting that the three passers-by were the content of God's appearing to Abraham. But whether we prefer the solution of "visiting the sick" or that of Rashbam is beside the point. We are all indebted to Rashi for subtly guiding us to a greater sensitivity to the conventions of the text and to the text's meaningful departures from its own literary conventions. Moreover, we are better readers thanks to his pedagogic genius in sending us in search of an explanation.

The second example I've chosen involves Rashi's comments to Deuteronomy 28:6. The verse appears in the context of Moses' closing speech to the Israelites wherein he lists the curses that will befall the nation should they sin against God's commands and the blessings that will attend the faithful adherence to the word of God. Among the blessings, we find, "Blessed shall you be in your comings and blessed shall you be in your goings."

Our intuitive reading of this verse is that the reward for following God's word will be the blessedness that will attend all of our comings and goings – all our daily commerce, in and outside our homes.

Yet Rashi confounds our expectations and chooses perhaps the least likely among the explanations to this verse offered in the Talmud (Bava Metzia 107a): "May your exit from this world be as much without sin as your entrance into this world."

What difficulty in the verse caused Rashi to comment altogether on this seemingly straightforward blessing? (Is this not an example of the proverbial, innocuously "blue scarf"?) And why depart from the plain meaning in favour of a talmudic homily that seems hardly indicated by the language or context?

The answer in this case is embedded in Rashi's sensitivity to unusual word order. Whereas this verse speaks of "comings" and only afterward of "goings," a brief look at other verses in the Hebrew Bible reveals a convention of spatial orientation that has been reversed here in Deuteronomy 28:6.

Consider the uniformity of idiomatic word order in the following verses:

- "…appoint someone over the community who shall go out before them and come in before them…" (Numbers 27:16-17)
- "…I am now 120 years old; I can no longer go out and come in." (Deuteronomy 31:2)
- "The city of Jericho was utterly quarantined; no one could go out or come in." (Joshua 6:1)
- "The Lord will safeguard your going out and your coming in now and forever." (Psalms 121:8)

As a useful analogy, let us note that the very word orientation implies the spatial bias of beginning our daily affairs facing east, toward the Orient, toward the rising sun. Similarly, in biblical Hebrew, the direction south is yamin or teiman, meaning "to the right," because the basic orientation in Hebrew culture as well is eastward. (When one faces east, the south is to one's right.)

In everyday English we would tend to say "come and go" rather than the opposite – much like the preference for "back and forth." But in biblical language it seems there is a spatial orientation that assumes a point of departure from inside the home, inside the city or inside the womb. What does it mean – philosophically or anthropologically – for one culture to assume a posture of the outside looking (or coming) in, and for another culture to see the most basic human condition as interior – looking outward? For the midrash adopted by Rashi, only the soul's entry into the womb – into this world – positions the entry prior to the exit.

Rashi's greatest contribution was sending the reader in search of the questions

No doubt, at the core of the original midrash was a moral agenda – intending to read the blessing as more than just a material promise of good fortune, but rather a life free of sin or moral failing. But Rashi's choice of this midrashic application was clearly stimulated by the need to address a textual anomaly of word order. Again, regardless of whether or not we choose to embrace Rashi's midrash on birth and death and the conduct of a life without sin – we are indebted to Rashi for calling our attention to an interesting and unique feature of this verse that deviates from standard biblical style.

As in many cases, Rashi has provided an answer, but the Socratic exercise of sending the reader in search of the question, of returning to the text to discover its bumps, its wrinkles, its pregnant nuances – this is Rashi's greatest contribution. In this latter example, even more than in the first, it is likely that the odd phrasing of the verse would have eluded most readers. Once pointed out, this verse opens the door to further thought and discussion of an entire anthropological topic of study spatial orientation in Hebrew culture – that otherwise may have remained "hidden in plain sight."

Returning to the secret of Rashi's magnetism and durability, ultimately it may reside in the remarkable and paradoxical capacity of his commentary to clarify and simplify, while at the same time shrewdly pointing toward the most subtle of nuances, and opening the door to further study and reflection.

Rabbi Shmuel Klitsner teaches biblical exegesis at Midreshet Lindenbaum in Jerusalem and is the author of a forthcoming book of psychological close readings of the Jacob stories.

Teaching Rashi today

By BARUCH SIENNA

It is almost impossible to exaggerate Rashi's impact on the history of biblical interpretation and Jewish life. Notwithstanding Rashi's other important contributions (his comprehensive and invaluable commentary on the entire Talmud), he is perhaps best known for his biblical commentary.

The Yiddish phrase "Chumash mit Rashi" captures the message of how central Rashi's commentary is to traditional Torah study. Whenever we study Torah and encounter a difficulty, Rashi is invariably patiently waiting in the margins to clarify and explain. In addition to his simple, clear and concise language, his genius was his ability to select and compress his encyclopedic knowledge of rabbinic texts so that the student would see the Torah text through the lens of classical Jewish interpretation.

The masterpiece Rashi sculpted out of the vast library of Jewish sources has, in fact, become the normative, classical Jewish understanding of Torah. Today one can find dozens of "super-commentaries," that is, commentaries not on the biblical text, but specifically on Rashi's comments themselves. Some have even suggested that all biblical commentary, on some level, is a commentary on Rashi.

As teachers of Torah to the next generation of Torah learners, though, we have a dilemma.

While we wish to familiarize our students with what Rashi says, we also want them to ask the same questions Rashi asked. As Jewish educator Joel Grishaver has said, "I want students to 'be Rashi.'"

This deductive approach is popular in many subjects. Instead of learning science, mathematics or even history as a series of facts from a textbook, students can be given the tools to discover the rules for themselves. In addition to being intrinsically more interesting, this kind of study leads to better comprehension and retention. I had the privilege of studying with the late Nechama Leibowitz z"l who popularized this approach with Rashi, and it is now universally considered good methodology to teach students to ask, "Mah kasheh leRashi? What is Rashi's difficulty?" (Prof. Martin Lockshin has convincingly argued that there are some cases, albeit infrequently, where Rashi seems to have his own agenda and brings a midrashic text on a biblical verse to elucidate a text with no apparent difficulty.)

Most of the time, Rashi should be read as an answer to a (usually unstated) question

Most of the time, however, Rashi should be read as an answer to a (usually unstated) question. There are the rare exceptions to this, where Rashi provides the question explicitly. For example, on Genesis, 6:14: "Make yourself an ark of gopher wood," Rashi asks, "And why is it called gopher wood?" before providing his answer.

Usually, the trick is to imagine the question, a sort of Jewish version of the popular TV quiz show Jeopardy. Pretend that Rashi is Alex Trebec, saying, "The answer is X," and we have to supply the question. But how do we teach students to ask these questions?

Before we can address this concern, we must first establish that the biblical text (regardless of one's view of the Torah's authorship) requires interpretation. In order for my message to be understood, you, the reader must interpret it.

Understanding operates on two levels. In order to read a verse or a story, or even this article, we first have to understand the actual words themselves. With the Torah written in biblical Hebrew, this is not always straightforward. What about words in the Bible whose meaning is different in modern Hebrew, like chem'ah (butter, today), which scholars render as curds; or botnim (peanuts today), which refers to pistachios? Or words that only appear once in the whole Bible and are unrelated to any other word (called hapax legomenon)? For example, what is the meaning of the "tzohar" (Genesis, 6:16) that was to be added to Noah's ark? Since no one has seen the ark, we don't know precisely what was meant. Even Rashi can't decide and offers two possibilities: a window, or a precious stone (like a crystal) that would provide light.

However, even when the meaning of the words is not disputed, and everyone (well, almost everyone – we probably can't get all Jews to agree on anything) might agree on the literal meaning of the words, we will probably still disagree about the text's meaning.

For example, God tells the Israelites that they were taken out of Egypt "on eagles' wings" (al kanfei nesharim). But since God didn't literally take the Israelites out on wings of birds, the expression is meant metaphorically. (Interestingly, in Operation Magic Carpet, the Yemenite Jews who had never seen airplanes before, saw their rescue on the "silver birds" as a literal fulfilment of the biblical verse).

Even though we understand the words, we must interpet the meaning of the phrase,

Exact meaning of a word is a problem

"on eagles' wings." Commentators disagree. Some suggest it means "with great power"; others offer "quickly." Rashi quotes the midrash that imagines the eagle, which flies higher than any other bird, carrying its offspring on its wings, as if to say to it, "If an arrow is shot, let me take the arrow and protect you."

These two examples also demonstrate that there are both "intended" and "non-intended" problems in understanding the biblical text. While we today may argue over the meaning of a certain word, like tzohar, we can assume our ancestors understood the language of the biblical text, and that the word itself had a specific meaning known to them and was not ambiguous. We no longer have that fluency and familiarity; so not knowing the exact meaning of a biblical word is an unintended problem in biblical interpretation.

Literary anomalies are only 'apparent contradictions' or 'apparent duplications' that we haven't yet solved

However, there may also be "problems" of interpretation that are, in fact, intended. In the latter example of "eagles' wings," it is possible that this image had different meanings, even for the original listeners.

When the Torah describes the midwives in Egypt, while we know the meaning of the words, the Hebrew phrase is ambiguous: "m'yaldot ivriot" can be translated equally as "Hebrew midwives" (i.e. midwives who are themselves Hebrews) or "Hebrews' midwives," (i.e. midwives to the Hebrews, but who were themselves Egyptian). Textual or contextual clues support both positions: Rashi chooses the former interpretation, but others like the Malbim, choose the latter.

The position chosen impacts on the meaning of the story in light of the midwives' actions. If the midwives were themselves Hebrews, while they would still be heroic, it would not be totally surprising that they took the side of the Hebrew birthing women against Pharaoh. But if they were Egyptian, then their courageous act of civil disobedience to defy their Pharaoh is all the more remarkable. The story's meaning hinges on our interpretation of this phrase, which may be deliberately ambiguous.

One final point. The classical view understands the text to be perfect; therefore, what might look like a contradiction or a duplication cannot be easily dismissed as a product of multiple authors or shoddy editors. Consequently, instead of "defects," we can choose to consider these literary anomalies only as "apparent contradictions" or "apparent duplications" that we haven't yet solved.

Rashi's comments are often so recognized and authoritative that they "blunt" our perceived difficulty with the text. We deny the problem, saying, "But Rashi in fact explains this..." That is my point. Of course it is a problem, or Rashi wouldn't have made his comment. But before one reads the solution of Rashi (or the midrash), one must be sensitive to the question that elicited the midrashic response.

Below are 14 classical examples of difficulties in understanding or interpreting the biblical text. I have italicized the problematic word(s) to make things easier:

1. The king of Egypt spoke to the Hebrew midwives, one of whom was named Shifrah and the other Puah... (Exodus, 1:15)
2. And this is the offering which you shall take of them: gold and silver and brass and blue and purple and scarlet and fine linen and goats' hair and rams' skins dyed red and tachash skins and acacia wood... (Exodus, 25:3)
3. This is the story of Isaac, son of Abraham. Abraham begot Isaac. (Genesis, 25:19)
4. On the first day of the second month, in the second year following the exodus from the land of Egypt, HaShem spoke to Moses... (Numbers, 1:1)

HaShem spoke to Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, on the first new moon of the second year following the exodus from the land of Egypt... (Numbers, 9:1)

5. For I am heavy of speech and heavy of tongue. (Exodus, 4:10)
6. When Kenan had lived 70 years, he begot Mahalalel. After the birth of Mahalalel, Kenan lived 840 years and begot sons and daughters. All the days of Kenan came to 910 years; then he died. (Genesis, 5:12-14)
7. When she could hide him no longer, she took an ark (teivah) for him... and placed it among the reeds by the bank of the Nile. (Exodus, 2: 3)
8. And Cain said to Abel his brother... and they were in the field. (Genesis, 4:8)
9. They came to Reuel, their father... Moses was a shepherd for his father-in-law Yitro, a Midianite priest. (Exodus, 2:18, 3:1)
10. And Moses looked this way and that, and seeing no one, he struck down the Egyptian and buried him in the sand. (Exodus, 2:12)
11. Then the whole congregation of the Israelites came into the desert of Zin in the first month: and the people stayed in Kadesh, and Miriam died there and was buried there.

And there was no water for the congregation... (Numbers, 20:1,2)

12. Cain said to his brother... Cain set upon his brother...

Where is your brother, Abel?... Am I my brother's keeper... Your brother's blood...

13. These are the generations of the heaven and the earth when they were created, in the day that HaShem God made the earth and the heavens. (Genesis, 2:4)

14. And Sarah laughed to herself, saying, "Now that I am withered, am I to have enjoyment – with my husband so old?!" Then HaShem said to Abraham, "Why did Sarah laugh, saying, 'Shall I in truth bear a child, old as I am?'" (Genesis, 18:12, 13)

In each of the above verses, we find a prominent difficulty, each one representing a different category. Rashi did not create these 14 categories, but I have developed this model for classifying different kinds of questions that are asked by Rashi or other classical commentators. For over 20 years, I have taught Rashi and Torah study to students in supplementary and day school settings, to adults and to teachers. I have listed the definitions of each of the 14 categories below, organized into seven pairs.

Try to identify the salient difficulty of the verses

These categories can help anyone who wants to study Rashi. I haven't provided Rashi's commentary on the 14 verses above, but you can still play Rashi Jeopardy. Before you imagine the question that Rashi would ask about these verses, try to identify the salient difficulty of the verses and then match them with my categories listed below?

I've done the first one for you: Number 1 matches with Category h.

Go ahead, put on your thinking beret (Rashi was French), and "be Rashi!"

Details

a. Missing Information: important details are not told, or the biblical text seems to be missing words (what Rashi calls mikra katzar).

b. Extraneous Information: seemingly unimportant details are provided. (Why do we need all those genealogies, anyway?)

Frequency:

c. Duplication: the Torah repeats something, or says the same thing in two different ways.

d. Theme or number word: the Torah repeats a key word 7, 10, or even more times in a brief passage.

Meaning

e. Literal: the literal meaning of a word is not known.

f. Metaphor: the literal meaning of a word is known, but the figurative meaning is not known.

A or B

g. Contradictions: the Torah says one thing here, a different thing there.

h. Ambiguity: the Torah says (only) one thing, but it is not clear whether that thing is this or that.

Connections

i. Word Echo: the Torah uses a word in one story that connects the story to another story.

j. Juxtaposition: two (seemingly unrelated) stories or verses side by side suggest a surprising connection between them.

Sequence

k. Symmetry: the Torah uses literary patterns that create symmetry.

l. Out of Order: the sequence of events is out of order.

Problem

m. Compare and Contrast: two parallel accounts have small but significant differences, emphasis, details.

n. Something Wrong: a character acts in a way that is morally problematic.

Tasting the new vintage – a Chanukah tradition in Rashi's house

Excerpted from Chapter 8 of Rashi's Daughters: Book One Joheved – Life, Love and Talmud in Medieval France.

By MAGGIE ANTON

Because the Cold Fair didn't end until late December, Troyes was always full of Jewish merchants during the festival of Chanukah. Each evening at sunset, Salomon's family squeezed into the crowded synagogue and watched as the holiday lamps were lit with blessings and songs during the service. Then, like other local Jews, Salomon's family shared their holiday suppers with guests. Before they ate, he kindled the family's holiday lamp, a beautiful silver menorah that Grandmama Leah had brought as part of her dowry.

Women refrained from work while the lamp was lit, in memory of one woman's heroism. Salomon explained that, in those days, a virgin about to be married was required to first submit to the king. So when the high priest's daughter was betrothed, the Greek monarch demanded that she lie with him. She went to the king, fed him cheese until he was thirsty, and then gave him enough wine to make him drunk. Once he'd fallen asleep, she severed his head and brought it back to her father in Jerusalem. When the enemy general saw that his king was dead, he and his army fled.

Some women made the entire week a holiday, but Leah regarded this as excessive and only allowed her granddaughters to rest on the first and last of the eight days. With all the vineyard pruning that needed to be done, they couldn't afford a week of idleness.

As wonderful as the weekdays were during the Festival of Lights, its Sabbath was even better. During services, the Scroll of the Hasmoneans was read aloud, and the congregation listened raptly as the reader recounted the triumphs of Mattathias and his sons over the evil despot Antiochus, intent on destroying them. Grandmama Leah translated for the women, and Joheved thought she made it sound as if she'd lived through the time herself.

When the enemy was defeated, and the Hasmoneans entered the sanctuary in Jerusalem, they found only one flask of pure olive oil. Though its quantity seemed sufficient only for one day, it lasted eight days, owing to the blessing of the God of Heaven who established His Name there. Hence, the Jews instituted these eight days as a time of feasting and rejoicing, and of kindling lights to commemorate the victories the Holy One had given them.

On most Saturday nights, Jewish families prolonged their evening meal, reluctant to leave the Sabbath and re-enter the regular week. But tonight Isaac's family joined them, and when they went outside to light the Chanukah lamp at the doorway to the courtyard, Joheved was surprised to see over a dozen people waiting, covered dishes in their hands.

"I see the celebrants have already started to arrive," Isaac laughingly nudged Salomon, his partner in the wine business.

Salomon began to make tables by laying boards on some of the benches outside, and several men came over to assist him. More people continued to enter the courtyard, and Salomon eyed the growing crowd with anxiety. "I hope there's still some of my wine left to sell tomorrow."

Everyone waited for the owners and their families to have the first tastes

"Consider it an advertising expense," Isaac said, throwing his arm around Salomon's shoulder. "If this vintage is as good as everyone seems to expect, merchants will be lining up at your door, making exorbitant offers."

Musicians arrived, and the strains of popular Chanukah melodies filled the air. Joheved couldn't see who was performing, but she could make out the sounds of string and wind instruments, as well as drums.

"Papa said we'd have a lot of people here to taste the new wine tonight, since so many of them helped make it." Miriam had to shout to be heard. "But I never expected such a mob."

"They won't drink it all, will they?" Joheved asked her father.

"Don't worry," Salomon said. "Most will only fill their cups a couple of times. They know the wine is our livelihood."

The menorah had nearly burned out, and torches were lit. Grandmama Leah took one look at the noisy bunch of strangers outside and announced that she was too tired to celebrate. Joheved and Miriam held their breaths, afraid that Mama would make them come inside and miss this marvellous event. But she only admonished them not to make themselves sick by eating too many rich desserts.

The Chanukah lamp's going-out seemed to be a signal. Salomon and Isaac strode to the cellar doors where several men helped them lay down planks for ramps. Cheers rang out each time a cask was rolled out and righted. Then Isaac climbed atop a bench, and those nearby immediately quieted. The hush spread like a ripple in a pond, and soon the courtyard was silent.

"Friends, my partner and I welcome you to our Chanukah festivities," Isaac boomed, his arms extended wide. "Let us fill our cups with new wine and toast the Festival of Lights!"

He jumped down from the bench to loud applause and the musicians broke into spirited tunes. Circles of dancers began to move in time, their shadows wheeling in the torchlight, while Salomon and his daughters stood behind the wine casks. Everyone waited for the owners and their families to have the first tastes.

Salomon took a few bites of bread. Then he filled his wine goblet and recited both the She-hechiyanu and the blessing over wine. When his daughters responded, "Amen," he handed the cup to them. He had waited so long for this moment, but now he couldn't bring himself to take the first taste.

Joheved took a sip and handed the cup to Miriam. The wine seemed quite good to her, but she knew she was no expert.

Miriam took her drink and passed it back to Salomon. It was now or never – Isaac and his son Joseph were waiting. He held up the goblet and proclaimed, "For life." Then he closed his eyes and took a mouthful.

Salomon kept the liquid on his palate and breathed in the bouquet. He could scarcely believe it. The Holy One had blessed him with an excellent vintage! He savoured the full-bodied flavour as he swallowed and then quickly took another taste to make sure he hadn't imagined that wonderful sensation.

Isaac saw the awe and pleasure in Salomon's eyes and quickly filled his own cup. "For a good life," he toasted his son.

Joseph returned the toast, "For a happy life." They each took a slow swallow and breathed out a very contented "Ah."

The revellers in the courtyard began to whisper excitedly. They could see the pleasure and pride on the vintner's face and crushed forward to get their cups filled. A fine vintage was a blessing for the whole community. Everything Salomon's family bought would be paid for with this wine, and soon it would grace every Jewish table in Troyes.

Salomon had Miriam take some wine inside for Mama and Leah, while Joseph refilled his cup and asked Joheved to bring it to his wife. She found Johanna deep in conversation with Nissim, the wool merchant, and offered her Joseph's cup. Like the others, Johanna tasted the wine slowly to savour it.

"Do you think we really need to move the wine out tonight?" Salomon asked the small group surrounding him. He had thought his worries about the vintage were finally over.

"Did Grandmama tell you that the count's men had taken her best wine before?" Joheved asked Miriam. While Leah had become more distrustful as her memory declined, what she did remember was often accurate.

"Oui. She said that whenever she had a good vintage, the count's tax collectors came right away." In an aside to her sister, Miriam whispered, "You wouldn't believe the curses Grandmama used when she talked about the count and his tax collectors."

Isaac was used to making decisions quickly when necessary. "I don't think we can take the risk."

Salomon gave up all thoughts of celebration. "We must find all the merchants who sold me goods in return for wine. They can take their shares tonight, and we'll tally accounts when the fair closes."

Miriam and Joheved stared at their father in surprise

"That will be a perfect job for me and the girls," Johanna said. She took Joheved and Miriam by the hand and pointed them into the crowd.

Joheved found Nissim almost immediately. Once he heard enough to understand the gist of the problem, he rushed off to the fairground, promising that he would be right back with his cart and horses. Soon other buyers were located, and if anyone doubted the basis for Leah's fears, the merchants' hasty actions were all the confirmation they needed.

The night wore on. The revellers danced, sang, ate and drank heartily, while against this festive background, men stealthily filled carts with wine barrels and slipped away into the darkness. Salomon instructed Joheved to keep a careful record of how much wine was taken away and by whom.

After the fair ended, Salomon announced that it was time to resume their Talmud classes. Since the holiday was still fresh in their minds, they would study the section in Tractate Shabbat that explained the laws of Chanukah.

As always, the sages Shammai and Hillel were arguing over some point of law. This time the subject was exactly how one should light the Chanukah lamp.

For those who fervently pursue mitzvot, the School of Shammai says that on the first day of Chanukah one kindles eight lights, and then continuously decreases the amount; but the School of Hillel says to kindle one light on the first day and continuously increase… Hillel's reason for a continual increase is that in sacred matters we elevate, not lower, the level of holiness.

Miriam and Joheved stared at their father in surprise. "That means Shammai starts with eight lights the first night, seven on the second night, and ends with just one light," Miriam said.

Salomon nodded. "That's right."

"But why light them backwards like that?" Joheved asked. Who would have imagined that other Jews did things so differently?

"Shammai believes this publicizes the true nature of the miracle, the single flask of oil that gradually diminished over eight days," he said.

"Everybody here does it like Hillel… I think," Miriam said.

"That's true, no one follows Shammai anymore," Salomon agreed.

Joheved continued reading.

"What is Chanukah?"

"Don't they know what Chanukah is?" Miriam interrupted. "They've been discussing it for pages."

"Maybe they're asking how we know to celebrate Chanukah," Joheved said. "It's not mentioned in Torah at all, not like our other holidays." She glowed with pride when her father said she was right.

Miriam continued reading and there was the story of the miraculous small flask of oil that burned for eight days. When she finished, Salomon asked if there was anything about Chanukah that puzzled them.

"Why did it take eight days to get new oil?" Miriam asked. "That seems like a long time."

"And why did the sages make an eight-day festival?" Joheved frowned. "I mean, since the flask started with enough oil for one night, didn't the miracle really occur the next seven nights?"

"Those are both good questions." Salomon nodded in approval. "Miriam, some sages say the nearest pure oil was a four-day journey away. Others say that the Jews were impure due to contact with corpses, because of the fighting, and it took seven days to purify them. Then they needed one more day to press the olives into oil."

"Joheved, many scholars have asked your question," he said with a smile. "Some answer that the flask of oil remained full after the lamp was filled, so it was evident even on the first night that a miracle was occurring. Others suggest that they divided the oil into eight parts and only poured that small amount into the menorah, yet the lamp burned the entire night. Thus a miracle did happen each day."

The Chanukah parade

By SHARON MELNICER

My sweet grandmother was a small woman, barely five feet tall. Her two-foot-tall candelabra was more than just a candleholder. It was a family symbol, a magnet that brought us all together. Today it sits on my mantle, right in the centre, holding a position of honour. I polish it daily, making sure that it gleams, as she so lovingly did all those years ago, before it came to me.

On Shabbat evenings, Baba would don a special Shabbat kerchief, a white linen square with a border of delicate lace. With great fanfare, she would light each candle. When she finished lighting the last candle, she stood in front of the candelabra and closed her eyes. Tears ran down her cheeks. She prayed for her husband, her married children and her grandchildren. She spoke in Yiddish: "Her mein tier tata, hiet oif mein man, kinder un di eyniklach." (Dearest Father in Heaven, watch and protect my husband, children and grandchildren. May it be your will that they grow up to be good people who are loyal to our religion. Please grant my dear husband a livelihood and patience. Watch over us all.)

We all stood by the Shabbat table in awe. Baba looked like a queen speaking to the King of Kings, to almighty God himself. When she finished her prayer, we began our Shabbat.

As our family grew, my grandmother spent more time with her candles. By the time she reached her 90th birthday, she had many married grandchildren, who also had children of their own. There were five generations in my Baba's family. When lighting the candles, she prayed for each family member, never omitting one.

As our family grew, my grandmother spent more time with her candles

Her candelabra was made of solid silver with a heavy silver base. All year it had three branches of two candlesticks. In the middle was a stem for another candle. The traditional custom for Shabbat eve is to light one candle each for the father, mother and children. As each child is born, another candle is added to the Shabbat lighting. Throughout the year Baba's candelabra was fitted for six candles.

During the week of Chanukah, she added another branch of two candlesticks each, for a total of 10 candles. The candelabra was built in such a way that its candleholders could be inserted for the special lighting on Chanukah. Our Shabbat candelabra was thus transformed into a chanukiyah.

During the week of Chanukah, she gave her prized candelabra to my grandfather to light candles for the holiday. Chanukah was our happiest time. All the children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren came to Baba and Zaida to receive Chanukah gelt and join in the lighting of the chanukiyah.

Imagine the two-foot chanukiyah with 10 candles shining in all its glory. Zaida stood proudly like a kohen, the high priest in the temple, when he lit the chanukiyah.

When my Zaida died, my grandmother sold their two-storey house on a leafy boulevard in Winnipeg's north end and moved to a tiny, one-bedroom apartment a dozen streets away. Though she couldn't pack up and take all of her cherished things, of course she packed her precious candelabra. She wrapped it in a large piece of worn, cotton flannel and then wrapped it again in tissue paper, before placing it gently into the box she had made a special trip to get from California Fruit on Main Street. Before every Shabbat, Baba would shine the silver candelabra and pray, "May my mazel [luck] always shine!"

All this came to an end when the moving van drove away that day in September 1965, after the movers had piled the cardboard boxes containing her things in the middle of the living room floor in her new apartment. The box holding the treasured menorah was missing. Her first thought was that it accidentally got left behind in the back of the truck, or that it was still at the house. After a telephone call to the moving company and a visit to the old house, it was clear someone had stolen her menorah.

My Baba was livid. Her small body shook like a willow in the storm as she spoke about her most prized possession, her candelabra. How could anyone take it? How would she light her candles?

She believed the menorah would return. "I have prayed that the menorah would protect us, and I'm sure that the menorah has done just that. Now I pray that the menorah protect itself and be returned to me."

With silent determination, she prayed and prayed. The family did not know what to do. Unexpectedly, a childhood friend from Austria, my grandmother's birthplace, came to visit her one day. They had been friends for years, both in Winnipeg after they married, and before that, as young girls in the old country.

She announced, "I never saw another menorah like yours until today. My mouth fell wide open when I saw a menorah just like yours in the window of a pawn shop I passed as I was walking down Main Street to your place."

Baba phoned my mother and her siblings immediately while Mrs. Stern sat listening in the kitchen. We were dumbfounded. Could it be that Baba's guest had actually seen the stolen menorah? Baba was geared up and ready for action.

"Let's get my menorah!" she declared. "It soon will be Chanukah and I need it back."

Baba, my parents, my Aunty Tzeril and my Uncle Simcha, Mrs. Stern and a police officer from the north-central precinct made their way down to the pawn shop.

Her eyes sparkling, and with a shout of confirmation and sheer joy, Baba pointed to her menorah. With a quick movement, she bent her head toward it and softly spoke to it like an old and trusted friend. In Yiddish she whispered, "Yes, you have done well. You have protected us and now you have protected yourself. Come back home with me. Kim a haim mit mere."

Before anyone could say anything, Baba grabbed the menorah off the shelf and held it close to her heart. Nobody could stop her. My Aunty Tzeril stayed behind with the police officer and shop owner to do the paper work.

By this time, the commotion had attracted quite a crowd. Neighbours, Jewish and non-Jewish, joined my grandmother in her triumphant walk home. As she came closer to her apartment building, more and more people joined her. My diminutive Baba, still wearing her apron and slippers, marched proudly, with the menorah in her arms almost as big as she was, followed by a procession of excited family and friends.

What a sight to see! It truly was a grand Chanukah parade.

The Chanukah menorah on the mountain

By BILL SLOTT

Kibbutz Ketura, in the south of Israel, is a small, quiet agricultural settlement with a rich tradition of community celebration.

Behind the kibbutz looms a stately limestone cliff that can be reached by a 45-minute climb up a well-worn goat path. The view from the top of the cliff is stunning, particularly at sunset, when the red mountains of Jordan on the opposite side of the Arava Valley turn radiant shades of pink and purple. With Ketura and its neighbouring kibbutzim laid out in crisp, panoramic detail, one might easily miss the seemingly irrelevant series of nine giant ashcans that stand along the edge of the cliff like silent rusted sentinels. But they are one of the most important cultural icons of this little kibbutz. This is the community's Chanukah menorah.

Each night of Chanukah, a different child from Ketura's bar mitzvah class ascends the mountain at sunset, accompanied by a parent, and lights the menorah. This is by no means a simple task. First, though the climb itself is a rite of passage the children generally have mastered by the age of five, in the winter it may be cold or windy, and by definition, the harrowing descent is under cover of darkness. Moreover, there is a complicated series of primitive tools employed in order to light this somewhat makeshift arrangement.

On this night, I am the parent, but as such, I am only a passive participant. The menorah is prepared and lit by my daughter, the bat mitzvah. First, there are rags, pilfered from the kibbutz laundry, which are stuffed in the top of the cans and soaked with diesel fuel to serve as giant wicks. Special care must be taken to load the central ashcan, perched higher than the others on a bump in the hill. This is the shamash. Then an old, dry palm frond, stripped bare of its leaves and crowned by fuel-soaked rags becomes the torch to light the "candles." All is prepared. We wait.

> We gaze in silent awe for a few minutes before we begin our descent

We ponder the vast emptiness of the desert and the stunning good fortune that has befallen us that we may be allowed to call this little spot of heaven our home. Just as the darkness begins to descend on the valley, it is time. My daughter pulls out the matches and prepares to light the shamash. Together, standing in the wind, we couple a modern tradition and an ancient one and recite the blessings. "Asher kidshanu" – who has commanded us… She'asa nisim – he has performed miracles for our ancestors… and of course the blessing that never fails to move me, Shehechiyanu. He has brought us this far. This far to this place in our lives. This far to this spot in the world. This far to this moment. This far to this mountain, to this celebration of miracles, ancient and modern.

The lighting itself is dramatic. Moving with simple grace through the darkness, my daughter lights the flames and finally returns the torch to the shamash. We gaze in silent awe for a few minutes before we begin our descent, constantly looking back over our shoulders at the flames that can be seen for miles. Below us in the kibbutz, though we can't see them, we know that families are gathered outside, staring up at the menorah that we have lit. The little children are pondering the homemade miracle of lights and the adults are perhaps pondering other miracles. Together, as if cued by the menorah on the mountain, the families will each go back inside to light their own little menorahs and say their own blessings.

The Jewish People are a people of endless cycles. Relearning the Torah every year, rebuilding the sukkah every year. Recounting the Omer and rehanging Haman. When my daughter and I reach the bottom of the mountain, just before we return home through the back gate of the kibbutz, we look up one last time, and without a shred of self-consciousness, we sing a lusty chorus of Maoz Tzur. One more cycle rekindled, one more reinterpretation of an ancient tradition. One more generation. Chag Samayach. Shehechiyanu.

Bill Slott is a tour guide in Israel who lives on Kibbutz Ketura.

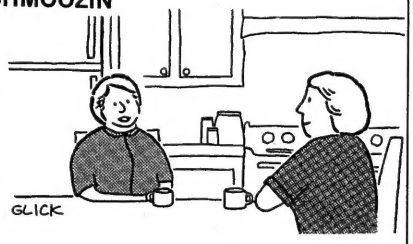
SHMOOZIN



"I admit that I am overly dependent on oil – how else could I make my potato latkes?"

The Festival of Lights 5766

By BARUCH COHEN

"The Chanukah events left their imprint on the entire future course of Jewish history." – Hayyim Schauss, The Jewish Festivals (Schocken Books, 1962, New York)

The first Chanukah was celebrated in Jerusalem on the 25th day of Kislev in the year 164 BCE. The circumstances surrounding it have as many ramifications for us today as they had for the original celebrants. To understand the meaning of Chanukah, the only Jewish holiday with historic origins that are fully clear, and why it is growing in importance today, it is necessary to look into the ancient world, and to see some of the parallels that exist between then and our life today.

Josephus Flavius, whose history of Chanukah is based on Maccabees 1, does not mention the term Chanukah and writes: "From that time onward unto this day we celebrate the festival, calling it 'lights.'" He explains that the festival acquired this name because the right to serve God came to the people unexpectedly, a miracle like a sudden light (Antiquities 12:35).

Primary aim of Maccabees was to preserve own identity

Chanukah in fact celebrates a victory of Hebraism over Hellenism. A victory of the camp of light against the camp of darkness. A mass uprising of the camp of freedom and democracy against the principles of totalitarianism. A triumphant resistance to anti-Semitic bigotry.

Chanukah celebrates the first serious attempt in history to proclaim and champion the principle of religious freedom and cultural diversity. The primary aim of the Maccabees was to preserve their own identity and safeguard for Israel the mission of being "a light into the nations." It was not only a fight against the danger of physical extinction but also a fight for Judaism. The mark of victory was not only a triumph against barbarism but also an act of dedication.

Bravery and unflinching adherence to Torah law characterized the Jewish heroes and heroines of the Chanukah story. Chanukah, which means dedication, celebrates Israel's victory over oppression, dark forces and the enemies desiring to extinguish the eternal flame of the Maccabees.

The Jewish People have a long history of surviving – and so we defy today's murderers, haters and all the forces of darkness, as we defied all our past and present enemies. We go on today as we did in the Maccabees' times, one age following another – and we remember. And our roots in our ancient Israel, our old-new homeland, grow stronger and stronger.

Today's Maccabees, the strong and heroic Israeli army, our brave soldiers, are the shield in the ongoing struggle for independence, freedom, democracy and security for the Jewish State, the Land of Israel and the Jewish People. Today, the State of Israel has a lively press, a thriving art scene, a strong modern economy, a vigorous youth culture and renowned universities.

Hod avinu chai! Chag urim samayach!
